Hooker, Eccles. Polity, l. 3.

2. Disposed to associate or unite with others; inclined to company; of social disposition; social; of animals, social.

Society is no comfort

To one not sociable. Shak., Cymbeline, iv. 2. 13.

3. Disposed to be friendly and agreeable in company; frank and companionable; conver-sible.

This Maciente, signior, begins to be more sociable on n sudden, methinks, than he was before.

B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, iv. 6.

4†. Friendly: with reference to a particular individual.

Is the king sociable,

And bids thee live? Beau. and Fl.

The sociable and loving reproof of a Brother.

Milton, Reformation in Eng., l.

5. Affording opportunities for sociability and friendly conversation.

I will have no little, dirty, second-hand chariot new furbished, but a large, sociable, well-painted coach.

W. Jerrold, Gentleman Dancing-Master, v. 1.

6. Characterized by sociability and the absence of reserve and formality: as, a sociable party.—7. Of, pertaining to, or constituting society; social. [Rare.]

His divine discourses were chiefly spent in pressing men to exercise those graces which adorn the sociable state.
Ep. Atterbury, Sermons, l. x.

Sociable weaver or weaver-bird. See weaver-bird, and weaver. Philotherus and live-nest.—Syn. 2 and 3.
Social, sociable, friendly, communicative, familiar. So far as social and sociable are like in meaning, sociable is the stronger and more familiar. They may differ in that so- cial may express more of the permanent character, and sociable the temporary mood: man is a social being, but is not always inclined to be sociable.

II. n. 1. An open four-wheeled carriage with seats facing each other.

They set out on their little party of pleasure: the children went with their mother, to their great delight, in the sociable. Miss Edgeworth, Belinda, xix.

2. A tricycle with seats for two persons side by side.

A sociable is a wide machine having two seats, side by side. This style of cycle has been used in Europe for wedding trips. Tribune Book of Sports, p. 454.

3. A kind of couch or chair with a curved S-shaped back, and seats for two persons, who sit side by side and partially facing each other. Also called vis-à-vis.—4. A gathering of people for social purposes; an informal party; especially, a social church meeting. [U. S.]

Their wildest idea of dissipation was a church sociable, or a couple of tickets to opera or theater.

The Century, XL, 272.

sociableness (sō'shi-ā-bl-nes), n. [< sociable + -ness.] Sociable character or disposition; inclination to company and social intercourse; sociability. Bailey, 1727.

sociably (sō'shi-ā-bl), adv. In a sociable manner; with free intercourse; conversibly; familiarly. Bailey, 1727.

social (sō'shi-ā), a. [= F. social = Sp. Pg. social = It. sociale = G. sozial, < L. socialis, of or belonging to a companion or companionship or association, social, < socius, a companion, fellow, partner, associate, ally, as an adj. partaking, sharing, associated, < sequi, follow: see sequent.] 1. Disposed to live in companies; delighting in or desirous of the company, fellowship, and cooperation of others; as, man is a social animal.—2. Companionable; sociable; ready to mix in friendly relations or intercourse with one's fellows; also, characteristic of companionable or sociable persons; as, social tastes; a man of fine social instincts.

Withers, adieu! yet not with thee remove Thy martial spirit or thy social love!

Pope, Epitaph on Withers.

He (King John) was of an amiable disposition, social and fond of pleasure, and so little jealous of his royal dignity that he mixed freely in the dances and other entertainments of the humblest of his subjects.

Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., II, 23.

3. Of or pertaining to society, or to the community as a body; as, social duties, interests, usages, problems, questions, etc.; social science.

Thou in thy seclusion, although alone,
Liest with thyself accompanied, seek'st not Social communion. Milton, P. L., viii, 429.

To love our neighbour as ourselves is such a fundamental truth for regulating human society that by that alone one might determine all the ends in social morality.

Locke.

We could right pleasantly pursue
Our sports in social silence too.

Scott, Marmion, iv, lnt.

Emerson is very fair to the antagonistic claims of solitary and social life.

O. W. Holmes, Emerson, xi.

4. In zool.: (a) Associating together; gregarious; given to flocking; republican; sociable; as, social ants, bees, wasps, or birds. (b) Colonial, aggregate, or compound; not simple or solitary; as, the social ascidians; social polygyny. See Sociales.—5. In bot., noting species of plants, as the common ragweed (Ambrosia trifida), in which the individuals grow in clumps or patches, or often cover large tracts to the exclusion of other species. Species of sage-brush, the common white pine and other conifers forming extensive forests, species of seaweed, etc., are social. — Social ascidians. See Sociales and Clavellinidae. — Social bees, the Apis, including the hive-bees; distinguished from solitary bees, or Andrena, etc. See Socialism. — Social contract, or original contract. See contract. — Social democracy, the principles of the Social Democrats; the scheme or system of social and democratic reforms proposed and aimed at by the Social Democrats of Germany and elsewhere; the party of the Social Democrats. — Social Democrat, a member of a socialistic party founded in Germany in 1863 by Ferdinand Lassalle, whose ultimate object is the abolition of the present forms of government and the substitution of a socialistic one in which labor interests shall be supreme, land and capital shall both belong to the people, private competition shall cease, its place being taken by associations of workmen, production shall be regulated and limited by officers chosen by the people, and the whole product of industry shall be distributed among the producers. For the present its members content themselves with the promotion of measures for the amelioration of the condition of the working classes, such as shortening the hours of labor, forbidding the employment of children in factories, and higher education for all. Social Democrats are now found in many of the countries of Europe, as well as in the United States. Since the fusion of the Lassalle and Marx groups of socialists in 1875, the social-democratic party in Germany has had remarkable development. — Social dynamics, that branch of sociology which treats of the conditions of the progress of society from one epoch to another. See sociology. — Social operation of the mind, an operation of the mind involving intercourse with another intelligent being. Reid. — Social sanction. See sanction. — Social science, the science of all that relates to the social condition, the relations and the institutions which are involved in man's existence and his well-being as a member of an organized community. It concerns itself more especially with questions relating to public health, education, labor, punishment of crime, reformation of criminals, pauperism, and the like. It thus deals with the effect of existing social forces and their result on the general well-being of the community, without directly discussing or expounding the theories or examining the problems of sociology, of which it may be considered as a branch. — Social statistics, that branch of sociology which treats of the conditions of the stability or equilibrium of the different parts of society or the theory of the mutual action and reaction of contemporaneous social phenomena on each other, giving rise to what is called social order. — Social war, in Itom. hist., the war (90–88 B. C.) in which the Italian tribes specially termed the Alles (socii) of the Roman state fought for admission into Roman citizenship. In the end the allies virtually obtained all they strove for, though at the expense of much bloodshed. Also called the Marsic war, from the Marsi, who took a leading part in the movement. — Social wasps, the Vespa, including hornets or yellowjackets, which build large papery nests inhabited by many individuals. See ants under hornet, Polistes, and wasps. — The social evil. See evil. — Syn. See sociable.

social-democratic (sō'shi-ā-dem-ō-krat'ik), a. Of or pertaining to the Social Democrats; characterized by or founded on the principles of the social democracy; as, social-democratic agitation. — Social-democratic party. Same as social democracy (which see, under social).

Sociales (sō'si-ā'lez), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. socialis, sociable, social.] A group of social ascidians, corresponding to the family Clavellinidae.

Socialinæ (sō'si-ā-lī-nō), n. pl. [NL., < L. socialis, social, + -inæ.] A subfamily of the family Apidae, including the genera Bombus and Apis, the species of which live in communities; the social bees. Each species is composed of three classes of individuals—males, females, and workers. They have the power of secreting wax, from which their cells are made, and the larvae are fed by the workers, whose legs are furnished with corbicula or pollen-baskets. See ants under Apis, bumblebee, and corbiculum.

socialisation, socialise. See socialization, socialize.

socialism (sō'shi-ā-izim), n. [= F. socialisme = Sp. Pg. socialismo = G. socialisme; as social + -ism.] Any theory or system of social organization which would abolish, entirely or in great part, the individual effort and competition on which modern society rests, and substitute for it cooperative action, would introduce a more perfect and equal distribution of the products of labor, and would make land and capital, as the instruments and means of production, the joint possession of the members of the community. The name is used to include a great variety of social theories and reforms which have more or less of this character.

What is characteristic of socialism is the joint ownership by all the members of the community of the instruments and means of production; which carries with it the consequence that the division of the produce among the body of owners must be a public act performed according to rules laid down by the community. Socialism by no means excludes private ownership of articles of consumption.

J. S. Mill, Socialism.

Socialism, . . . while it may admit the state's right of property over against mother state, does away with all ownership, on the part of members of the state, of things that do not perish in the using, or of their own labor in creating material products.

Hooley, Communism and Socialism, p. 7.

Christian socialism, a doctrine of somewhat socialistic tendency which sprang up in England about 1850, and flourished under the leadership of Charles Kingsley, Frederick D. Maurice, Thomas Hughes, and others. The main contentions of its advocates were (1) that Christianity should be directly applied to the ordinary business of life, and that in view of this the present system of competition should give place to cooperative associations both productive and distributive, where all might work together as brothers; (2) that any other change of the laborer's life, as aimed at in most socialistic schemes, would not suffice to settle the labor question, but that there must be an inner change brought about by education and elevation of character, especially through Christianity; and (3) that the aid of the state should not be invoked further than to remove all hostile legislation. A similar scheme appeared somewhat earlier in France. The doctrine of Christian socialism, or similar doctrines under the same name, have been frequently advocated in the United States.

— Professorial socialism. Same as socialism of the chair. — Socialism of the chair, a name first used in France in 1872 by Oppenheim, one of the leaders of the National Liberals for the doctrine of a school of political economy in Germany which repudiated the principle of laissez-faire, adopted in the study of political economy the historical method (which see, under historical), and strove to secure the aid of the state in bringing about a better distribution of the products of labor and capital, especially to bring to the laborer a larger share of this product, and to elevate his condition by means of factory acts, savings-banks, sanitary measures, shortening of the hours of labor, etc.

socialist (sō'shi-ā-ist), n. and a. [= F. socialiste = Sp. Pg. socialista = G. socialist; as social + -ist.] 1. n. One who advocates socialism.

A contest who can do most for the common good is not the kind of competition which Socialists repudiate.

J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., II, i, § 3.

Christian socialist, a believer in, or an advocate of, the doctrine of Christian socialism. See socialism. — Professorial socialist. Same as socialist of the chair. — Socialist of the chair, a believer in, or an advocate of, socialism of the chair. See socialism.

II. a. Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of socialism or its advocates; relating to or favoring socialism: as, a socialist writer.

It must be remembered that in a socialist farm or manufactory each labourer would be under the eye, not of one master, but of the whole community.

J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., II, i, § 3.

socialistic (sō'shi-ā-lis'tik), a. [< socialist + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of the socialists; based on the principles of socialism: as, socialistic schemes; socialistic legislation.

Socialistic troubles of close bonds

Between the generous rich and grateful poor.

Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, viii.

The general tendency is to regard as socialistic any interference with property undertaken by society on behalf of the poor, the limitation of the principle of laissez-faire in favour of the suffering classes, radical social reform which disturbs the present system of private property as regulated by free competition.

Encyc. Brit., XXII, 205.

socialistically (sō'shi-ā-lis'ti-kal-i), adv. In a socialistic manner; in accordance with the principles of socialism.

sociality (sō'shi-ā-lī-ti), n. [= F. socialité = It. socialità, < L. socialitas (-t-), fellowship, sociability, < socialis, social: see social.] 1. The character of being social; social quality or disposition; sociability; social intercourse, or its enjoyment.—2. The impulses which cause men to form society. Sociality, in this sense, is a wider term than sociability, which embraces only the higher parts of sociability. The latter is a philosophical word, while the former is common in familiar language.

Sociality and individuality, . . . liberty and discipline, and all the other standing antagonisms of practical life.

J. S. Mill, Liberty, II.

socialization (sō'shi-ā-lī-zā'shon), n. [< socialize + -ation.] The act of socializing, or the state of being socialized; the act of placing or establishing something on a socialistic basis. Also spelled socialisation.

It was necessary in order to bring about the socialization of labour which now we see.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLII, 643.

socialize (sō'shi-ā-lī-z), v. t.; prot. and pp. socialized, ppr. socializing. [< social + -ize.] 1. To render social.

The same forces which have thus far socialized mankind must necessarily, in Mr. Spencer's view, go on to make the world a happier and better one.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII, 123.

2. To form or regulate according to the theories of socialism.

Also spelled socialisc.

socially (sō'shi-ā-lī), adv. In a social manner or way; as, to mingle socially with one's neighbors. Latham.

socialness (sō'shi-ā-nes), n. Social character or disposition; sociability or sociality. Bailey, 1727.

sociate (sō'shi-ā-t), v. i. [< L. sociatus, pp. of sociare, join, associate, accompany, < socius, partaking, associated, as a noun a companion, fellow: see social. Cf. associate.] To associate.

They seem also to have a very great love for professors that are sincere; and, above all others, to desire to sociate with them, and to be in their company.

Bunyan, Hilgrins Progress, p. 254.

sociate (sō'shi-ā-t), n. [< L. sociatus, pp.: see the verb.] An associate.

Fortitude is wisdom's sociate.

Middleton, Solomon Paraphrased, vi.

As for you, Dr. Reynolds, and your sociates, how much are ye bound to his majesty's clemency?

Fuller, Church Hist., X, i, 22.

sociative (sō'shi-ā-tiv), a. [< sociate + -ive.] Expressing association, cooperation, or accompaniment. [Rare.]

The pure dative, the locative, and the instrumental (including the sociative).

Trans. Amer. Philol. Ass., XVII, 79.

societarian (sō'si-ā-tā-ri-ān), a. [< societary + -an.] Of or pertaining to society.

The all-sweeping besom of societarian reformation.

Lamb, Decay of Beggars.

societary (sō'si-ā-tā-ri), a. [= F. sociétaire; as societ-y + -ary.] Of or pertaining to society; societarian. [Rare.]

A philosopher of society, in search of laws that measure and forces that govern the aggregate societary movement.

N. A. Rev., CXXXIX, 18.

society (sō'si-ā-ti), n.; pl. societies (-tiz). [< F. société = Pr. societat = Sp. sociedad = Pg. sociedade = It. società, < L. societas (-t-), companionship, society, < socius, sharing, partaking, associated, as a noun a companion, fellow: see social.] 1. Fellowship; companionship; company; as, to enjoy the society of the learned; to avoid the society of the vicious.

Hol. I beseech your society.
Nath. And thank you, too; for society, saith the text, is the happiness of life. Shak., L. L. L., iv. 2. 167.

The seatmeats which beautify and soften private society. Burke, Rev. in France.

2†. Participation; sympathy.

If the parties die in the evening, they weep all night with a high voice, calling their neighbors and kindred to society of their grief. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 847.

The meanest of the people, and such as have least society with the acts and crimes of kings. Jer. Taylor. (Imp. Diet.)

3. Those persons collectively who are united by the common bond of neighborhood and intercourse, and who recognize one another as associates, friends, and acquaintances.—4. An entire civilized community, or a body of some or all such communities collectively, with its or their body of common interests and aims: with especial reference to the state of civilization, thought, usage, etc., at any period or in any land or region.

Although society and government are thus intimately connected with one another, each of the two society is the greater. J. C. Calhoun, Works, I. 5.

Among philosophical politicians there has been spreading the perception that the progress of society is an evolution. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 117.

Specifically—5. The more cultivated part of any community in its social and intellectual relations, interests, and influences; in a narrow sense, those, collectively, who are recognized as taking the lead in fashionable life; those persons of wealth and position who profess to act in accordance with a more or less artificial and exclusive code of etiquette; fashionable people in general: as, he is not received into society. In this sense frequently used adjectively: as, society people; society gossip; a society journal.

Society became interested, and opened its ranks to welcome one who had just received the brevet of "Man of Letters." Hayward, Letters, I. ii. (Encyc. Diet.)

These envied ladies have no more chance of establishing themselves in society than the benighted squire's wife in Somersetshire, who reads of their doings in the Morning Post. Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xxxvii.

As to society in 1837, contemporary commentators differ. For, according to some, society was always gambling, running away with each other's wives, causing and committing scandals, or whispering them; the men were spendthrifts and profligates, the women extravagant and heartless. W. Besant, Fifty Years Ago, p. 110.

6. An organized association of persons united for the promotion of some common purpose or object, whether religious, benevolent, literary, scientific, political, convivial, or other; an association for pleasure, profit, or usefulness; a social union; a partnership; a club: as, the Society of Friends; the Society of the Cincinnati; a sewing society; a friendly society.

In this sense the Church is always a visible society of men; not an assembly, but a society. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, iii. 1.

It is now near two hundred years since the Society of Quakers denied the authority of the rite altogether, and gave good reasons for disusing it. Emerson, The Lord's Supper.

Specifically—7. In eccles. law, in some of the United States, the corporation or secular body organized pursuant to law with power to sue and be sued, and to hold and administer all the temporalities of a religious society or church, as distinguished from the body of communicants or members united by a confession of faith. When so used in this specific sense, members of the society are those who are entitled under the law to vote for trustees—usually adults who have been stated attendants for one year and have contributed to the support of the organization according to its usages, while members of the church are those who have entered into a religious covenant with one another. To a considerable extent both bodies are the same persons acting in different capacities. Under the law in some jurisdictions, and in some denominations in all jurisdictions, there is no such distinction.—Amalgamated societies. See amalgamate.—Bible, building, cooperative, etc., society. See the qualifying words.—Dorcas Society, an association of women organized for the supply of clothes to the poor: named from the Dorcas mentioned in Acts ix. 36. Frequently the members of the society meet at stated times and work in common. Partial payment is generally required from all except the very poorest recipients.—Emigrant aid societies. See emigrant.—Fruit-bringing Society. Same as Order of the Palm (which see, under palm²).—Guaranty society. See guaranty.—Harmony Society. See Harmonist, 4.—Red-Cross Society, Ribbon Society, etc. See the adjectives.—Society hands, in printing, workmen who belong to a trade society, and work under its rules. [Eng.]—Society houses, in printing, offices that conform to the rules of a trade society. [Eng.]—Society journal or newspaper, a journal which professes to chronicle the doings of fashionable society.—Society of the Perfectibilists. Same as Order of the Illuminati (which see, under Illuminati).—Society screw. See screw¹.—Society verse, verse concerned with the lighter society topics; poetry of a light, entertaining, polished character.—The Societies. See Cameronian, 1.—Syn. 1. Corporation, fraternity, brotherhood.—6 and 7. Union, league, lodge.

socii, n. Plural of socius.

Socinian (sō-sin'i-an), a. and n. [= Sp. Pg. It. Sociniano, < NL. Socinianus, < Socinus (It. Sozzini): see def.] I. a. Pertaining to Lælius or Faustus Socinus or their religious creed.

II. n. One who holds to Socinian doctrines. See Socinianism.

Socinianism (sō-sin'i-an-izm), n. [< Socinian + -ism.] The doctrines of the Italian theologians Lælius Socinus (1525–62) and Faustus Socinus (1539–1604) and their followers. The term is in theological usage a general one, and includes a considerable variety of opinion. The Socinians believe that Christ was a man, miraculously conceived and divinely endowed, and thus entitled to honor and reverence, but not to divine worship; that the object of his death was to perfect and complete his example and to prepare the way for his resurrection, the necessary historical basis of Christianity: that baptism is a declarative rite merely, and the Lord's Supper merely commemorative; that divine grace is general and exerted through the means of grace, not special and personally efficacious; that the Holy Spirit is not a distinct person, but the divine energy; that the authority of Scripture is subordinate to that of the reason; that the soul is pure by nature, though contaminated by evil example and teaching from a very early age; and that salvation consists in accepting Christ's teaching and following his example. The Socinians thus occupy theologically a midway position between the Arians, who maintain the divinity of Jesus Christ, but deny that he is co-equal with the Father, and the Humanitarians, who deny his supernatural character altogether.

Socinianize (sō-sin'i-an-iz), v. t.; prot. and pp. Socinianized, ppr. Socinianizing. [< Socinian + -ize.] To render Socinian in doctrine or belief; tinge or tincture with Socinian doctrines; convert to Socinianism. Also spelled Socinianise.

I cannot be ordained before I have subscribed and taken some oaths. Neither of which will pass very well, if I am ever so little Popishly inclined or Socinianized. Tom Brown, Works, I. 4. (Davies.)

sockdologer (sok-dol'ō-jēr), n. [Also sockdologer, socdologer, sogdologer; a perversion of dologer, taken in the sense of 'the finishing act,' in allusion to the customary singing of the doxology at the close of service.] 1. A conclusive argument; the winding up of a debate; a settler.—2. A knock-down or decisive blow.—3. Something very big; a whopper.

Fit for an Abbot of Thelme, . . .
The Pope himself to see in dream
Before his lenten vision gleam, Ho lies there, the sogdologer!
Lowell, To Mr. John Bartlett, who had sent me a seven-pound trout.

4. A patent fish-hook having two hooked points which close upon each other as soon as the fish bites, thus securing the fish with certainty. [U. S. slang in all uses.]

socket (sok'et), n. [< ME. soket, sokete, < OF. soket, dim. of **soc*, m., soche, souche, F. souche, f., = It. zocco, m., a stump or stock of a tree; same as F. socque = Sp. zoco = Pg. soco, socco, a sock, wooden shoe, clog, < L. soccus, a sock, shoo: see *sok*¹. Cf. socle.] 1. An opening or cavity into which anything is fitted; any hollow thing or place which receives and holds something else.

Another pyec wherln the sokette or mortays was made that the body of the crosse stood in. Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 165.

My eyes burn out, and slink into their sockets. Fletcher, Wife for a Month, iv. 4.

The head [of the statue] seems to have been of another piece, there being a socket for it to go in, and probably it was of a more costly material. Pococke, Description of the East, II. ii. 74.

Specifically—2. A small hollow tubo or depression in a candlestick to hold a candle. Also called noze.

Item, J. candlestick, withoute sockettes, weying xviii. unces. Paston Letters, I. 473.

There was a lamp of brass, with eight sockets from the middle stem, like those we use in churches.  Evelyn, Diary, Aug. 10, 1641.

3. In anat., specifically, the hollow of one part which receives another; the concavity or excavation of an articulation: as, an eye-socket; the socket of the hip.—4. In mining, the end of a shot-hole, when this remains visible after the shot has been fired.—5. In well-boring, a tool with various forms of gripping mechanism, for seizing and lifting tools dropped in the tubo.—6. In the just, a defense of steel attached to the saddle, and serving to protect the legs and thighs. Compare bur<sup>1</sup>, 3 (c). Also socquette.—Ball and socket. See ball<sup>1</sup>.

Right Scapula, seen from in front. G, glenoid fossa or socket.

Socket, French form, end of 14th century. (From Viollet-le-Duc's "Dictionnaire du Mobilier français.")

socket (sok'et), v. t. [< socket, n.] To provide with or place in a socket.

socket-bayonet (sok'et-bū'ō-net), n. A bayonet of modern type, in which a short cylinder fits outside the barrel of the gun.

socket-bolt (sok'et-bōlt), n. In mach., a bolt that passes through a thimble placed between the parts connected by the bolt.

socket-caster (sok'et-kās'tēr), n. A caster attached to a socket which is fitted over the end of a leg of a piece of furniture.

socket-celt (sok'et-selt), n. A celt with a socket into which the handle or haft is fitted, as distinguished from celts of those forms in which the handle is secured to the outside of the head.

socket-chisel (sok'et-chiz'el), n. A chisel having a hollow tang in which the handle is inserted. The form is used for heavy chisels employed especially in mortising.

socket-drill (sok'et-drīl), n. A drill for countersinking or enlarging a previously drilled hole. It has a central projection which fits the drilled hole, and laterally projecting cutting edges which enlarge or countersink the hole.

socketed (sok'et-ed), p. a. 1. Provided with or placed in a socket.

Two white marble columns or pillars, socketed in two foot steps of black marble well polished.

Archæologia, X. 404.

Referring to drainage, we read of socketed pipes which are unconnected at the joints.

Lancet, 1893, II. 915.

2. In anat., received in a socket; articulated by reception in a socket.

socket-joint (sok'et-jōint), n. A ball-and-socket joint; an enarthrodial articulation, or enarthrosis, as those of the shoulder and hip.

socket-pipe (sok'et-pīp), n. A joint of pipe with a socket at one end, usually intended to receive the small end of another similar joint.

socket-washer (sok'et-wosh'ēr), n. A washer with a countersunk face to receive the head of a bolt, etc.; a cup-washer. E. H. Knight.

socket-wrench (sok'et-rench), n. A wrench for turning nuts, having a socket fitted to a special size and shape of nut to be turned. See cut under wrench.

sockethead (sok'hed), n. A stupid fellow. [Prov. Eng.]

sockless (sok'les), a. [< sock<sup>1</sup>, n., + -less.] Lacking socks; hence, without protection or covering; said of the feet.

You shall behold one pair [of legs], the feet of which were in thine past sockless.

Beau. and Fl., Woman-Hater, I. 3.

sockman, n. See socman.

socky (sok'i), a. See soaky.

socle (sō'kl), n. [Also socle; = G. Sw. socket = Dan. sokkel, < F. socle, a plinth, pedestal, < It. zoccolo, formerly socolo, a plinth, a wooden shoe, formerly also a stilt, < L. sockulus, dim. of soccus, a light shoe, sock; see sock<sup>1</sup>. Cf. sock-ct.] 1. In arch., a low, plain member, serving as a foundation for a wall or pedestal, or to support vases or other ornaments. It differs from a pedestal in being without base or cornice, and is higher than a plinth. A continued socle is one extending around a building or part of a building.

2. One of the ridges or elevations which support the tentacles and sense-bodies of some worms.

socman (sok'man), n. [Also sockman, sokeman; repr. AS. **sōcman* (ME. sochman, ML. sokman-nus, socomannus, socamannus, socmannus, socke-mannus), a feudal tenant or vassal, < sōc, the exercise of judicial power, + man: see sokel and soken.] One who holds lands or tenements by socage.

A seignior of pillage, which had n biron of old ever ventured to arrogant, burress and citizen, socman and boeman, villcin and churl, would have burned him alive in his castle.

Bulwer, My Novel, xii. 19.

socmanry (sok'man-ri), n.; pl. socmanries (-riz). [< ML. socmanaria, < socmannus, sokmannus, etc., < AS. sōcman: see socage.] Tenure by socage.

These tenants . . . could not be compelled (like pure villeins) to relinquish these tenements at the lord's will, or to hold them against their own: "et ideo," says Bracton, "dilectur liberi." Britton also, from such their freedom, calls them absolutely sokemans, and their tenure sokemanries.

Blackstone, Comm., II. vi.

Socotran (sok'ō-tran), a. and n. [< Socotra (see def.) + -an.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to Socotra, an island in the Indian Ocean, off the east coast of Africa.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Socotra. Also Socotrine.

Socotrine (sok'ō-trin), a. and n. [< Socotra (see Socotran) + -ine.] Same as Socotran.—Socotrine aloes. See aloes, 1.

socour, n. A Middle English form of succor.

socquette, n. Same as socket, 6.

Socratic (sō'krat'ik), a. and n. [= F. Socratique = Sp. Socrático = Pg. It. Socratico, < L. Socraticus, < Gr. Σωκρατικός, of or pertaining to Socrates, < Σωκράτης, Socrates.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the methods, style, doctrine, character, person, or followers of the illustrious Athenian philosopher Socrates (about 470-399 B. C.). His father, Sophroniscus, was a sculptor, and he was brought up to the same profession. His mother, Phanostrata, was a midwife. Socrates was justly accused, before the council of the pythanes of being a corrupter of youth, and of not believing in the gods of the city, was condemned, and died by drinking hemlock. His philosophy is known to us by the account of Xenophon, written to show the practical upshot of his teachings and the injustice of his sentence, and by the Dialogues of Plato, in most of which Socrates is introduced only to give an artistic setting to Plato's own discussions. Some things can also be inferred from fragments of Aristotle, and from the doctrines of other companions of Socrates. He wrote nothing, but went about Athens frequenting some of the best houses, and followed by a train of wealthy young men, frequently cross-questioning those teachers whose influence he distrusted. He himself did not profess to be capable of teaching anything, except consciousness of ignorance; and he bargained for no pay, though he no doubt took moderate presents. He called his method of discussion (the Socratic method) obstetric (see maieutic), because it was an art of inducing his interlocutors to develop their own ideas under a catechetical system. He put the pretensions to shame by the practice of Socratic irony, which consisted in sincerely acknowledging his own defective knowledge and professing his earnest desire to learn, while covertly admitting the pretensions of the person interrogated, and in persisting in this attitude until examination made it appear bitter sarcasm. He was opposed to the rhetorical teaching of the sophists, and had neither interest nor confidence in the physical speculations of his time. The center of his philosophy, as of all those which sprang directly or indirectly from him—that is to say, of all European philosophy down to the rise of modern science—was morality. He held that virtue was a species of knowledge; really to know the right and not to do it was impossible, hence wrong-doers ought not to be punished; virtue was knowledge of the truly useful. He was far, however, from regarding pleasure as the ultimate good, declaring that if anything was good in itself, he neither knew it nor wished to know it. The great problems he held to consist in forming general conceptions of the nature of truth, happiness, virtue and the virtues, friendship, the soul, a ruler, a suit of armor—in short, of all objects of interest. These conceptions were embodied in definitions, and these definitions were framed by means of analytic reflection upon special instances concerning which all the world were agreed. He would not allow that anything was known for certain concerning which competent minds opined differently. This process of generalization, the Socratic induction, together with the doctrine of the necessity of definitions, were his two contributions to logic.

The disciples of Socrates were Plato, Euclides, Theodorus, Antisthenes, Aristippus, Xenophon, Eschylus, Simplicius, Cebes, and about twenty more. Properly speaking, there was no Socratic school; but the Academy and the Megarian, Eleatic, Eretrian, Cylic, and Cyrenaic schools are called Socratic, as having been founded by immediate disciples of Socrates.—Socratic school. See school<sup>1</sup>.

II. n. A disciple of Socrates: as, Æschines the Socratic.

Socratical (sō'krat'ik-al), a. [< Socratic + -al.] Socratic in sense, style, or to some extent. [Rare.]

Socratically (sō'krat'ik-al-i), adv. In the Socratic manner; by the Socratic method.

Socraticism (sō'krat'ik-i-zm), n. [< Socratic + -ism.] A Socratic peculiarity, absurdity, or the like. Encyc. Brit., VIII. 579.

Socratism (sok'ra-tizm), n. [< Socrates + -ism.] The doctrines or philosophy of Socrates. Imp. Dict.

Socratist (sok'ra-tist), n. [< Socrates + -ist.] A disciple of Socrates; one who uses the Socratic method; a Socratic.

Socratize (sok'ra-tiz), v. i.; pret. and pp. Socratized, ppr. Socratizing. [< Socrates + -ize.] To use the Socratic method. [Rare.]

"What is to prevent me from Socratizing?" was the question by which he [Ramus] established his individual right to doubt and inquiry.

J. Owen, Evenings with Skeptics, I. 255.

sod<sup>1</sup> (sod), n. [< ME. sod, sode = OFries. sātha, sāda = MD. sode, soode, soede, socuwe, soye, D. zode, zoo; = MLG. sode, LG. sode = G. sode, sod, turf: so called as being sodden or saturated with water; a deriv. or particular use of OFries. sāth, sād = MD. sode, later sood, zoo = MLG. sōd, LG. sod = MHG. sōt, sōd, boiling, seething, also a well, = AS. sēath, a well, pit, < sēathan (pret. sēath, pp. soden), etc., boil, seethe: see seethe, sodden<sup>1</sup>, etc.] 1. The upper stratum of grass-land, containing the roots of grass and the other herbs that may be growing in it; the sward or turf.

Tender blue-bells, at whose birth The sod scarce heaved. Shelley, The Question.

To rest beneath the clover sod.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, x.

2. A piece of this grassy stratum pared or pulled off; a turf; a divot or fail.

She therefore, to encourage her people against the enemies, mounted up into an high place raised up of turfs and sods made for the noose.

Holmshed, Hist. Eng., iv. 19.

Sod kiln, a lime-kiln made by excavating the earth in the form of a cone, filling with alternate layers of fuel and broken limestone, and covering the top with sods to prevent loss of heat. Sometimes the sides are lined with sods.—The old sod, one's native country; especially used by Irish emigrants: as, he's a clever lad from the old sod. [Colloq.] sod<sup>1</sup> (sod), v. t.; pret. and pp. sodded, ppr. sodding. [< sod<sup>1</sup>, n.] To cover with sod; turf.

The slope was sodded and terraced with rows of seats, and the spectators looked down upon the circular basin at the bottom.

sod<sup>2</sup>. An obsolete preterit and past participle of seethe.

soda (sō'di), n. [= F. Sp. Pg. D. G. Sw. Dan. soda (NL. soda), < It. soda, soda, OIt. soda (= OF. soulde, saltwort, glasswort, fem. of sodo, contr. of soldo, solid, hard: see solid).] 1. Sesquicarbonate or normal carbonate of sodium ( $\text{Na}_2\text{CO}_3$ ); soda-ash: the latter being the common name of the commercial article, one of the most, if not the most, important of all the products of chemical manufacture. Various hydrated carbonates of sodium occur in nature—the decahydrate or natron; the monohydrate, known as thermonatrite; and trona, a compound of the sesquicarbonate and the bicarbonate with three equivalents of water. These natural carbonates occur in solution in the water of various alkaline lakes, or as deposits at the bottoms of such as have become dried up, but usually mixed with more or less common salt, sodium sulphate, and other saline combinations. It was from these deposits, and from the excretion of various plants growing by the sea-shore (Salsola, Salicornia, Chenopodium, Stachys, Reynouaria, Nitraria, Tetragonia, Mesembryanthemum), that soda was formerly obtained. These sources have become of little importance since artificial soda began to be made from common salt, a process invented by Leblanc, and put in operation near Paris toward the end of the eighteenth century. By this process common salt is decomposed by sulphuric acid, and the resulting sodium sulphate is mixed with limestone and coal, and heated in a reverberatory furnace, the product (technically known as black ash) consisting essentially of soluble sodium carbonate and insoluble calcium sulphide, which are easily separated from each other by lixiviation. By the Leblanc process the soda used in the arts was almost exclusively produced until about thirty years ago, when the so-called ammonia or Solvay process began to become of importance. This process had been patented in England as early as 1838, and tried there and near Paris, but without success. The difficulties were first overcome by E. Solvay, who in 1861 established a manufactory of soda by this process (since known by his name) near Brussels. By the ammonia or Solvay process a concentrated solution of common salt is saturated with ammonia, and then decomposed by carbonic acid. By this means sodium chloride is converted into sodium carbonate, and the ammonia is afterward recovered by the aid of lime or magnesia. This process has within the past few years become of great importance, and at the present time about half the soda consumed in the world is made by it. Whether it will eventually entirely supplant the Leblanc process cannot yet be stated. The chief advantage which it presents is that the amount of coal consumed by it is much smaller than that required by the older process, so that countries where fuel is not very cheap and abundant can now make their own soda, being no longer dependent on England, as they were in large degree before the Solvay process became successful. For the properties of pure soda, see sodium carbonate, under sodium. Also called mineral alkali.

2. Soda-water. [Colloq.].—Ball soda, crude soda.—Caustic soda. See caustic.—Nitrate of soda. See nitrate.—Salt of soda, sodium carbonate.—Soda cocktail. See cocktail.—Soda niter. Same as nitrate.—Soda powder. See powder.

soda-alum (sō'dj-ā-lūm), n. A crystalline mineral, a hydrated double sulphate of aluminium and sodium, found on the island of Melos, at Solfatara in Italy, and near Mendoza on the east of the Andes. Also called mendozite.

soda-ash (sō'dj-āsh), n. The trade-name of sodium carbonate. See soda.

soda-ball (sō'dj-bāl), n. An intermediate product in the manufacture of sodium carbonate, formed by fusing together sodium sulphate, coal-dust, and limestone. Also called black ash. See also soda.

soda-biscuit (sō'dj-bis'kit), n. A biscuit raised with soda. See biscuit, 2. [U. S.]

soda-cracker (sō'dj-krak'ēr), n. A kind of cracker or biscuit, consisting of flour and water, with a little salt, bicarbonate of soda, and cream of tartar, made into a stiff dough, rolled thin, and cut into squares. [U. S.]

The eccentric old telegraph editor . . . kept a colony of white mice in a squirrel-cage, feeding them upon soda-crackers and milk. The Century, XXXVIII, 575.

soda-feldspar (sō'dj-feld'spär), n. See feldspar.

soda-fountain (sō'dj-foun'tün), n. 1. A metal or marble structure containing water charged with carbonic-acid gas (or containing materials for its production), with faucets through which the water can be drawn off. Soda-fountains commonly contain tanks for flavoring-syrups and a reservoir for ice.—2. A strong metal vessel lined with glass or other non-corrosible material, used to store and transport water charged with carbonic-acid gas under pressure.

soda-furnace (sō'dj-fēr'näs), n. A furnace for converting into the carbonate, by fusing with chalk and slaked lime or small coal, the sulphate of soda obtained by treating common salt with sulphuric acid. In a usual form the cylinder which receives the charge is heated red-hot before being filled, and is caused to rotate by appropriate mechanism. E. H. Knight.

sodaic (sō-dä'ik), a. [soda + -ic.] Of, relating to, or containing soda: as, sodaic powders.

sodaine, a. An obsolete form of sudden.

soda-lime (sō'dj-lim), n. In chem., a mixture of caustic soda and quicklime, used chiefly for nitrogen determinations in organic analysis.

sodalite (sō'dj-lit), n. [soda + -lite.] A mineral so called from the large portion of soda which enters into its composition. It is commonly found in volcanic rocks, occurring in isometric crystals and also massive, and is usually of a blue color, also grayish, greenish, yellowish, and white. It is a silicate of aluminium and sodium with sodium chloride.

sodalite (sō-dal'i-ti), n. [= F. sodalite, < L. sodalita (t), companionship, friendship, a brotherhood or society, < sodalis, a mate, a fellow, a boon companion.] A fraternity; confraternity; especially in use by Roman Catholics for a religious fraternity or society.

He was a learned gentleman, and one of the club at the Mermaid, in Friday street, with Sir Walter Raleigh, &c., of that sodalite, heroes and wits of that time. Aubrey, Lives (Thomas Harriot), note.

soda-lye (sō'dj-lī), n. A solution of sodium hydrate in water.

soda-mesotype (sō'dj-mes'ō-tīp), n. Same as natrolite.

soda-mint (sō'dj-mint), n. A mixture containing sodium bicarbonate and spearmint.

soda-paper (sō'dj-pā'pēr), n. A paper saturated with sodium carbonate: used as a test-paper, and also for inclosing powders which are to be ignited under the blowpipe, so that they may not be blown away.

soda-plant (sō'dj-plānt), n. A saltwort, Salsola Soda, one of the plants from whose ashes harilla was formerly obtained.

soda-salt (sō'dj-sālt), n. In chem., a salt having soda for its base.

soda-waste (sō'dj-wāst), n. In the soda industry, that part of soda-ball or black ash which is insoluble in water. It contains sulphids and hydrates of calcium, coal, and other matters.

soda-water (sō'dj-wā'tēr), n. 1. A drink generally consisting of ordinary water into which carbonic acid has been forced under pressure. On exposure to the ordinary atmospheric pressure, the excess of carbonic acid escapes, thus causing effervescence. It rarely contains soda in any form; but the name originally applied when sodium carbonate was contained in it has been retained. It is generally sweetened and flavored with syrups.

2. A solution used to cool drills, punches, etc., used in metal-working.

sod-burning (sod'hēr'ning), n. In agri., the burning of the turf of old pasture-lands for the sake of the ashes as manure.

sod-cutter (sod'kut'ēr), n. A tool or machine for cutting or trimming sods; a paring-plow; a sodding-spade.

sodden<sup>1</sup> (sod'n), p. a. [ME. sodden, soden, < AS. soden: see seethe.] 1. Boiled; seethed.

And also brede, soddyn eggs, and somtyme other vytayles. Sir R. Guyford, Pylgrymage, p. 17.

Which dinned by the blade-bones of sheepe, sodde and then burnt to powder. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 414.

2. Soaked and softened, as in water; soaked through and through; soggy; pulpy; pultaceous; of bread, not well baked; doughy.

It had ceased to rain, but the earth was sodden, and the pools and rivulets were full. Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, iv.

3. Having the appearance of having been subjected to long boiling; parboiled; bloated; soaked or saturated, as with drink.

Double your files! as you were! faces about! Now, you with the sodden face, keep in there! Beau, and Fl., Knight of Burning Pestle, v. 2.

sodden<sup>2</sup> (sod'n), v. [sodden<sup>1</sup>, p. a.] 1. Intrans. 1. To be seethed or soaked; settle down as if by seething or boiling.

It [avarice] takes as many shapes as Proteus, and may be called above all the vice of middle life, that sodden into the gangrene of old age, gaining strength by vanquishing all virtues. Mrs. S. C. Hall.

2. To become soft, as by rotting. [Uniquo.]

They never fail who die In a great cause: the block may soak their gore; Their heads may sodden in the sun. Byron, Marino Faliero, ll. 2.

II. trans. To soak; fill the tissues of with water, as in the process of seething; saturate. Clothes . . . soddened with wet. Dickens, Little Dorrit, i. 11.

soddenness (sod'n-nes), n. Sodden, soaked, or soggy character or quality.

The soddenness of improperly boiled or fried foods will be avoided. Science, XV, 230.

sodding-mallet (sod'ing-mal'et), n. A beating-tool with a broad, flat face, for smoothing and compacting newly laid sods.

sodert, n. and v. A former spelling of solder. Isa. xli. 7.

sodeyat, sodeynliche. Obsolete forms of sudden, suddenly.

sodger<sup>2</sup> (sō'jēr), n. The whelk. Italianell. [Prov. Eng.]

sodic (sō'dik), a. [sod(ium) + -ic.] Consisting of or containing sodium.

sodic-chalybeate (sō'dik-kā-lib'ē-āt), a. Containing both iron and sodium: used of mineral waters.

sodium (sō'di-um), n. [= F. G. sodium = Sp. Pg. It. sodio, < NL. sodium, < soda + -ium.] Chemical symbol, Na (natrium); atomic weight, 23.05. The metallic base of the alkali soda. See soda and metal.

It was first isolated by Davy. In 1807, by electrolysis, and is at present obtained on a large scale by igniting sodium carbonate with charcoal. Sodium is a silvery-white metal with a high luster, but it oxidizes rapidly on exposure to moist air. Heated in the air, it burns rapidly with a bright-yellow flame, very characteristic of the metal; thrown into cold water, it oxidizes, but does not become hot enough to set the evolved hydrogen on fire, as potassium does; with hot water, ignition of the hydrogen takes place. Its specific gravity at 50° is 0.9735; at the ordinary temperature it has the consistency of wax; at 204° it melts, and forms a liquid resembling mercury in appearance. Next to silver, copper, and gold, it is of the metals, the best conductor of heat and electricity; next to cesium, rubidium, and potassium, it is the most electropositive of the metals. It is extensively used in the laboratory as a powerful reducing agent; it is closely analogous to potassium in its chemical relations. Two of its compounds are very widely diffused in nature, and of the highest importance from various points of view; these are common salt and sodium carbonate, or soda.—Sodium bicarbonate, a compound having the formula NaHCO<sub>3</sub>. It is a white crystalline powder, with a weaker alkaline taste than the other carbonate described below, and less soluble in water. Also called soda saturatus.—Sodium borate. See borax.—Sodium carbonate, a compound having the formula Na<sub>2</sub>CO<sub>3</sub>, either anhydrous or containing water of crystallization. (The method of manufacture is described under soda.) Anhydrous sodium carbonate, or chemically pure soda, is a white powder having an alkaline taste and reaction, readily soluble in water with evolution of heat. It fuses at a dull-red heat to a clear liquid. It is used in enormous quantities in the arts for a great variety of purposes. When crystallized from aqueous solution it forms transparent crystals, called washing-crystals, which contain ten equivalents of water. These effloresce on exposure to air.—Sodium chloride, common salt, NaCl.

See salt, 1.—Sodium line, the bright-yellow line (strictly a double line) which incandescent sodium vapor gives when viewed by the spectroscope; it corresponds to the dark absorption-line D (D<sub>1</sub> and D<sub>2</sub>) of the solar spectrum.—Sodium nitrate. See nitrate of soda, under nitrate.

sod-oil (sod'oil), n. Oil pressed from sheepskins by tanners, and used in manufacturing the lowest grades of brown soap.

Sodom-apple (sod'om-ap'l), n. 1. Same as apple of Sodom (which see, under apple). Specifically—2. The nightshade, Solanum Sodomæum; also, sometimes, in the United States, the horse-nettle, S. Carolinense, or some similar species.

sodomist (sod'om-ist), n. [Sodom (see Sodomite) + -ist.] A sodomite.

Dorset your son, that with a fearful soul

Leads discontented steps in foreign soil.

Shak., Rich. III., iv. 4. 312.

3. A mixture of fine earthy material with more or less organic matter resulting from the growth and decomposition of vegetation on the surface of the ground, or from the decay of animal matter (manure) artificially supplied. The existence of soil over any area implies a previous decomposition of the rocks, and climatic and other physical conditions favorable to the growth of vegetation. As these conditions vary, so varies the thickness of the soil. That which lies next beneath the soil and partakes of its qualities, but in a less degree, is called the subsoil.

Sir Walter Blunt, new lighted from his horse,

Stain'd with the variation of each soil

Betwixt that Holmedon and this seat of ours.

Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 1. 64.

Life without a plan,

As useless as the moment it began,

Serves merely as a soil for discontent

To thrive in. Cowper, Hope, l. 97.

4. In soldering, a mixture of size and lamp-black applied around the parts to be joined to prevent the adhesion of melted solder.

soil² (soil), n. [Early mod. E. also soyl, soyle; < OF. soil, souil, F. souille, the mire in which a wild boar wallows, = Pr. soll, mire, prob. < L. suillus, belonging to swine, < sus, swine, sow: see sow². Cf. soil³, v.]. A marshy or wet place to which a hunted boar resorts for refuge; hence, a wet place, stream, or water sought for by other game, as deer.

Soil, or soil de sanglier, the soil of a wilde boare, the slough or mire wherein he hath wallowed.

Cotgrave.

As deer, being struck, fly through many soils,

Yet still the shaft sticks fast.

Marston, Malcontent, iii. 1.

To take soil, to run into the water or a wet place, as an animal when pursued; hence, to take refuge or shelter.

O! what a sport, to see a Heard of them [harts]

Take soyl in Sommer in som spacious stream!

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, l. 6.

O, sir, have you ta'en soil here? It's well a man may reach you after three hours running yet.

B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, l. 1.

soil³ (soil), v. [Early mod. E. also *soyle; < ME. soilen, soillen, suilen, sullen, < OF. sollier, souiller, soil, refl. (of a swine), take soil, wallow in the mire, F. souiller, soil, sully, dirty, = Pr. sulhar, solar = Pg. sujar = Oit. sogliare, soil; from the noun soil²: see soil². In another view, F. souiller, soil, dirty, is < L. *suculare, wallow like a pig, < L.L. suculus, a porker, dim. of sus, swine, sow, being thus from the same ult. source as above; so Pr. sulhar, soil, < sulha, a sow; cf. Sp. emporcar, soil, < L. porcus, a pig. The relations of the forms here grouped under soil³ are somewhat uncertain. The word is not akin to sully.] I. trans. 1. To make dirty on the surface; dirty; defile; tarnish; sully; smirch; contaminate.*

I haue but one hool hatere. . . . I am the lasse to blame

Though it be soiled and selde cleane.

Piers Plowman (B), xiv. 2.

Our kingdom's earth should not be soil'd

With that dear blood which it hath fostered.

Shak., Rich. II., i. 1. 125.

Truth is as impossible to be soiled by any outward touch as the sunbeam.

Milton, Divorce.

2. To dung; manure.

Men . . . soil their ground; not that they love the dirt, but that they expect a crop.

South.

II. intrans. To take on dirt; become soiled; take a soil or stain; tarnish: as, silver soils sooner than gold.

soil<sup>3</sup> (soil), n. [Early mod. E. also soyle; < sail<sup>3</sup>, v. In def. 3 prob. now associated with soil<sup>1</sup>, 3.] 1. Any foul matter upon another substance; foulness.

A lady's honour must be touched,

Cf. soul<sup>2</sup>, n.] To stall-feed with green food; feed for the purpose of fattening.

The fitchew, nor the soiled horse, goes to't
With a more riotous appetite.

Shak., Learn, iv. 6, 124.
You shall cozen me, and I'll thank you, and send you brawn and bacon, and soil you every long vacation a brace of foremen [geese], that all Mithelmas shall come up fat and klesking.
Beau, and Fl., Hillaster, v. 3.

During their first summer they [calves] do best to be soiled on vetches, clover, or Italian ryegrass, with from 1 lb. to 2 lb. of cake to each calf daily.

tion, a lawsuit, hence in old law soc, the power of hearing suits and administering justice within a certain precinct: see sack<sup>1</sup>, sake<sup>1</sup>. The words sok and saken are practically identical in orig-sense, but are to be kept separate, being different forms. Soc is the AF. (Law F.) form of sok, which is itself a ME. form archaically preserved (like bote, mote). The mod. form would be sok, as the mod. form of bote is boot, and that of mote is moot.] 1. The power or privilege of holding a court in a district, as in a manor; jurisdiction of causes; also, the limits

Solanaceæ (sō-lā-nā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL (Bartling, 1830), < Solanum + -aceæ.] An order of gamopetalous plants, of the series Bicarpellatæ and cohort Polemoniales, characterized by regular flowers commonly with a plicate border, carpels with many ovules, and a straight, spiral, or coiled embryo in fleshy albumen. The sepals, petals, and stamens are each usually five, the ovary usually entire and two-celled, with an undivided style. In its plicate corolla the order resembles the Convolvaceæ, which are, however, unlike it in their few-seeded carpels and usually twining habit. Its other nearest ally is the Scrophulariæ, to which the tribe Salpiglossidæ, with its didynamous stamens and somewhat irregular flowers, forms a direct transition. The order includes about 1,750 species, perhaps to be reduced to 1,500, classed in 72 genera of 5 tribes, for the types of which see Solanum, Atropa, Hyoscyamus, Cestrum, and Salpiglossis. They are erect or climbing herbs or shrubs, or sometimes trees, and either smooth or downy, but rarely with bristles. They bear alternate and entire toothed or dissected leaves, often in scattered unequal pairs, but never truly opposite. The typical inflorescence is a bractless cyme, either terminal, opposite the leaves, or lateral, but not truly axillary, and sometimes converted into umbels or sessile clusters or reduced to a single flower. They are usually rank-scented and possess strongly narcotic properties, either throughout or in special organs. In Mandragora in the root, in most others strongly developed in the leaves, as in belladonna, tobacco, henbane, stramonium, and nightshade. In some, as the henbane, this principle is actively developed for a limited time only; in others, parts from which it is absent furnish a valued food, as the potato, tomato, and egg-plant, or a condiment, as Cayenne pepper. The order furnishes also several tonics and numerous diuretic remedies, as species of Physalis, Nicotiana, Cestrum, and Solanum. Plants of this order are widely dispersed through warm climates of both hemispheres, extending beyond the tropics in North and South America, especially in the west, but less frequent in Europe and Asia. They are absent in alpine and arctic regions and in Australia. About 17 genera and 55 species are natives of the United States, chiefly in the southwest, and largely of the genera Lycium, Solanum, and Physalis. For other important genera, see Lycopersicum, Capsicum, Datura, Nicotiana, Petunia, and Solandra.

solanaceous (sō-lā-nā'shius), a. [< NL. Solanaceæ + -ous.] Belonging to the Solanaceæ.

soland (sō-lānd), n. See solan.

solander<sup>2</sup> (sō-lān'dër), n. [< Solander (see quot. and Solandra).] A form of box designed to contain prints or drawings. See the quotation.

A Solander case is the invention of Dr. Solander, of memory dear to readers of "Cook's Voyages," who used one to contain and preserve specimens for natural history, drawings, and matters of the kind. It is really a box, generally shaped like a book, one side of which, turning on hinges, serves for a lid, while the front, or fore edge of the case, is furnished with hinges to be let down, so that the fronts as well as the tops of the contents can be got at.

Solandra (sō-lān'drā), n. [NL (Swartz, 1787), named after Daniel Solander (born 1736, died about 1781), a Swedish botanist and traveler.] A genus of solanaceous plants, of the tribe Atropæ. It is characterized by solitary flowers with a long calyx-tube, an obliquely funnel-shaped corolla with broad imbricated lobes and induplicate sinuses, five stamens, and a two-celled ovary imperfectly four-celled by false partitions, forming in fruit a pulpy berry half-protruded from the torn membranous calyx. The 4 species are all American and tropical. They are lofty climbing coarse shrubby plants, with entire smooth fleshy and coriaceous shining leaves, clustered near the ends of the branches, and very large terminal white, yellowish, or greenish flowers on fleshy pedicels. S. grandiflora, S. longiflora, and other species are sometimes cultivated from the West Indies under the name trumpet-flower, forming handsome greenhouse evergreens, usually grown as climbers, or, in S. longiflora, as small shrubs.

Solanææ (sō-lā-nē-ē), n. pl. [NL (A. L. de Jussieu, 1789), < Solanum + -ææ.] A tribe of plants of the order Solanaceæ. It is distinguished by flowers with the corolla somewhat equally plicate or divided into valvate or induplicate lobes, and having perfect stamens and a two-celled ovary which becomes an indehiscent berry in fruit, containing compressed seeds with a curved embryo and slender seed-leaves not broader than the radicle. It includes 31 genera, very largely natives of South America. For some of the most important, see Solanum (the type), Capsicum, Lycopersicum, and Physalis.

solanæus (sō-lā-nē-us), a. Belonging to the Solanaceæ, or especially to Solanum.

solan-goose (sō-lān-gōs), n. [< solan + goose.] The gannet, Sula bassana. Also solan and soland-goose. See Sula, and cut under gannet.

solanina (sō-lā-nī-nā), n. [NL, < Solanum.] The active principle of Solanum Dulcamara. See solanine.

solanine (sō-lā-nīn), n. [NL, < Solanum + -ine<sup>2</sup>.] A complex body, either itself an alkaloid or containing an alkaloid, the active principle of bitter-sweet, Solanum Dulcamara. It is a narcotic poison.

solanoid (sō-lā-noid), a. [< NL. Solanum + Gr. eidōs, form.] Resembling a potato in texture: said of cancers.

Solanum (sō-lā-num), n. [NL (Tournefort, 1700), < LL. solanum, the nightshade.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, type of the order Solanaceæ, the nightshade family, and tribe Solanææ. It is characterized by flowers usually with a deeply five- or ten-lobed spreading calyx, an angled or five-lobed wheel-shaped corolla, very short filaments with long anthers which form a cone or cylinder, open by a vertical pore or a larger chink, and are almost destitute of any connective, and a generally two-celled ovary with its conspicuous placenta projecting from the partition. It is one of the largest genera of plants (compare Senecio), and includes over 950 published species, of which perhaps 750 are distinct. Their distribution is similar to that of the order, and they constitute half or two thirds of its species. They are herbs, shrubs, or small trees, sometimes climbers, of polymorphous habit, either smooth, downy, or woolly, or even viscous. They bear alternate entire or divided leaves, sometimes in pairs, but never truly opposite. Their flowers are yellow, white, violet, or purplish, grouped in panicles or umbels cymes which are usually scorpioid, sometimes apparently racemose, rarely reduced to a single flower. The species form two groups, the subgenera Pachystemonum and Lepostemonum (Dunal, 1813), the first unarmed and with broad anthers, the other with long anthers opening by minute pores, and commonly armed with straight spines on the branchlets, leaves, and calyx. South America is the central home of the genus, and of its most useful member, the potato, S. tuberosum, which occurs in numerous wild varieties, with or without small tubers on the rootstocks, from Lima to latitude 45° S. in Patagonia, and northward to New Mexico. (See potato, potato-rot, and cut under rotate and tuber.) There are 15 native species in the United States, chiefly in the southwest, besides numerous prominent varieties and 5 introduced species. The seeds of many species are remarkably tenacious of life, and are therefore soon naturalized, especially the cosmopolitan weed S. nigrum, the common or black nightshade, the original type of the genus (for which see nightshade, and figure of leaf under repand); and compare ointment of poplar-buds, under ointment): from this the name nightshade is sometimes extended to several other European species. For S. Dulcamara, the bitter-sweet, the other common species of the northeastern United States, a climber introduced for ornament, see nightshade, felomoort, dulcamara, and dulcamarin. Two others in the United States are of importance as prickly weeds, S. Carolinense (for which see hore-nettle), a pest which has sometimes caused fields in Delaware to be abandoned, and S. rostratum (for which see sand-bur), of abundant growth on the plains beyond the Mississippi, and known as the chief food of the Colorado beetle or potato-bug before the introduction of the potato westward. The genus is one of strongly marked properties. A few species with comparatively inert foliage have been used as salads, as S. nodiflorum in the West Indies and S. sessiliflorum in Brazil; but the leaves of most, as of the common potato, bitter-sweet, and nightshade, are more or less powerfully narcotic. (See solanine.) The roots, leaves, seeds, and fruit-juices yield numerous remedies of the tropics; S. jubarum is strongly sudorific; S. pseudoquina is a source of quina in Brazil, a powerful bitter and febrifuge; others are purgative or diuretic, as S. paniculatum, the jerubeba of Brazil; S. stramonifolium is used as a poison in Cayenne. The berries are often edible, as in the well-known S. Melongena (S. esculentum) (for which see egg-plant, brinjal, and aubergine). Others with edible fruit are S. aviculare (see kangaroo-apple), S. Uporo, the cannibal-apple or borodina of the Fiji and other Pacific islands, with large red fruit used like the tomato, S. rescum, the gungany of southeastern Australia, S. album and S. Ethiopicum, cultivated in China and southern Asia, S. Gilo in tropical America, S. muricatum, the pepino or melon-pear of Peru, and S. racemosum in the West Indies. S. Quitoense, the Quito orange, yields a fruit resembling a small orange in color, fragrance, and taste. S. Indicum (S. Anguini) is known as Madagascar potato, and S. crispum of Chili as potato-tree. Some species bear an inedible fruit, as S. mammosum, the macaw-bush (which see), also called susumber and (together with S. torvum) turkey-berry. For S. Bahamense, see cankerberry, and for S. Sodomæum, see Sodom-apple. Other species yield dyes, as S. gnaphalioides in Peru and S. Vespertilio in the Canaries, used to paint the face; S. Guineense, used to dye silk violet; and S. indigoferum, in cultivation in Brazil for indigo. S. marginatum is used in Abyssinia to tan leather; and the fruit of S. saponaceum is used as soap in Peru. Several species have been long cultivated as ornamentals for their abundant red or orange berries, as S. Pseudo-capsicum, the Jerusalem cherry or winter-cherry (see cherry), and the Brazilian S. Capsicastrum, the dwarf winter-cherry or star-espica. Many others are now cultivated as ornamental plants, and are known by the generic name Solanum, as S. Karstenii, from Venezuela, with violet flowers; S. betaceum, a small pink-flowered fleshy South American tree with fine scarlet egg-like fruit; and S. lanceolatum, with narrow willow-like leaves, reputed the most showy blooming species. Others are cultivated for their conspicuous foliage, as S. erinitum and S. macranthum, with leaves 2½ feet long; S. robustum, clad in showy red down; and S. Warscewiczii, with handsome flowers and large leaves elegantly cut. The climber S. jasminoides, the jasmine-solanum, is a house-plant from Brazil, esteemed for its large and abundant clusters of fragrant white or bluish flowers.

Solar apex, the point in space, situated in the constellation Hercules, toward which the sun is moving.—Solar apophysis. Same as sunstroke.—Solar boiler, an apparatus for utilizing the heat of the sun's rays in the heating of water and the production of steam.—Solar calorific engine. Same as solar engine.—Solar camera, chronometer. See the nouns.—Solar constant, the number which expresses the quantity of radiant heat received from the sun by the outer layer of the earth's atmosphere in a unit of time. As shown by the researches of Langley, its value is probably somewhat over three (small) calories per minute for a square centimeter of surface normal to the sun's rays. See calory and sun.—Solar cooking-apparatus, an arrangement for cooking food by the heat of the sun's rays. It consists essentially of a cooking-vessel inclosed in a glass frame, upon which the solar rays are directed by reflectors.—Solar cycle. See cycle.—Solar day. See day, 3.—Solar deity, in myth., a deity of the sun, or personifying some of the attributes or characteristics of the sun, or of the sun's action. A familiar example is the Greek Apollo or Helios. Solar deities play an important part in the mythology of ancient Egypt, the chief of them being Ra, the supreme power for good. The Egyptian solar deities are commonly distinguished in art by bearing upon their heads the solar disk. See also cut under Apollo, and compare solarism.—Solar eclipse.

See equation.—Solar eyepiece, a helioscope; an eyepiece suitable for observing the sun. In the ordinary form, devised by Sir John Herschel, the sunlight is reflected at right angles by a transparent plane surface which allows most of the light and heat to pass through, so that only a thin shade-glass is needed. In the more perfect polarization-heliocopes of Merz and others the light is polarized by reflection at the proper angle from one or more glass surfaces, and afterward modified in intensity at pleasure by reflection at a second polarizing surface, or by transmission through a Nicol prism which can be rotated.—Solar fever, dengue.—Solar flowers, flowers which open and shut daily at certain determinate hours.—Solar ganglion. See month, 2.—Solar myth, in compar. myth., a myth or heroic legend containing or supposed to contain allegorical reference to the course of the sun, and used by modern scholars to explain the Aryan mythologies. The fable of Apollo and Daphne is an example.—Solar observatory, an astronomical observatory specially equipped for the study of solar phenomena. The observatory at Meudon, near Paris, is an example.—Solar physics, the study of the physical phenomena presented by the sun.—Solar plexus, in anat. See plexus. Also called brain of the belly.—Solar print, in photog., a photographic print made in a solar camera from a negative. It is usually an enlargement, and is so called to distinguish it from an ordinary photo-print made by direct contact in a printing-frame, or otherwise.—Solar prominence or protuberance. See sun.—Solar radiation. Solar telegraph. See telegraph.—Solar theory. See solarism.—Solar time. Same as apparent time. See time.—Solar walk, the zodiac.—Solar year. See year.

Solariidæ (sō-lā-rī'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Solarium + -idæ.] A family of pectinibranchiate gastropods, typified by the genus Solarium. The animal has the tentacles nearly united at the base; eyes on the upper part of the outer side of their base; the proboscis long, cylindrical, completely retractile; and the shell conical and generally declivous from the apex, with carinated margin of the last whorl, and a deep umbilical cavity, recalling a spiral staircase. The species inhabit tropical seas. They are rather large and generally handsome shells, some of which are common parlor ornaments. See cut under Solarium.

solariplex (sō-lar'ī-pleks), n. The solar plexus (which see, under plexus). Coues, 1887.

solarism (sō'lār-izm), n. [ < solar<sup>1</sup> + -ism.] Exclusive or excessive explanation of mythology by reference to the sun; over-addiction to the assumption of solar myths. Gladstone, in Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 634.

solarist (sō'lār-ist), n. [ < solar<sup>1</sup> + -ist.] An adherent of the doctrine of solarism. Gladstone, in Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 876.

solarium (sō-lā-rī-um), n. [ < L. solarium, a sun-dial, a part of a house exposed to the sun, < solaris, of the sun: see solar<sup>1</sup>.] 1. A sun-dial, fixed or portable. See dial, poke-dial, ring-dial, sun-dial.—2. A place arranged to receive the sun's rays, usually a flat house-top, terrace, or open gallery, formerly used for pleasure only, but in modern times commonly as an adjunct of a hospital or sanatorium, in which case it is inclosed with glass; a room arranged with a view to giving patients sun-baths.—3. [cap.] [NL. (Lamarck, 1799).] The typical genus of Solariidæ, containing the staircase-shells, as the perspective shell, S. perspectivum. They have a much depressed but regularly conic shell, angular at the periphery, and with a wide spiral umbilicus which has suggested the idea of a spiral stairway.

Staircase-shell (Solarium perspectivum).

solarization (sō'lār-i-zā'shon), n. [= F. solari-sation; as solarize + -ation.] 1. Exposure to the action of the rays of the sun.—2. In photog., the injurious effects produced on a negative by over-exposing it in the camera to the light of the sun, as blurring of outlines, obliteration of high lights, loss of relief, etc.; also, the effects on a print resulting from over-printing the sensitized paper or other medium.

solarize (sō'lār-iz), v.; pret. and pp. solarized, ppr. solarizing. [= F. solari-s; as solar<sup>1</sup> + -ize.] 1. intrans. In photog., to become injured by too long exposure to the action of light.

It is a familiar fact that iodide of silver solarizes very easily—that is, the maximum effect of light is quickly reached, after which its action is reversed.

Lea, Photography, p. 137.

II. trans. 1. To affect by sunlight; modify in some way by the action of solar rays.

A spore born of a solarized bacillus is more susceptible to the reforming influence than its parent was.

Science, VI. 475.

2. In photog., to affect injuriously by exposing too long to light.

solarly (sō-lā-rī), a. [ < ML. **solaris* (used only as a noun), pertaining to the ground or soil, < L. solum, the ground, soil: see soil<sup>1</sup>.] Of or belonging to the ground. [Rare.]

From the like spirits in the earth the plants thereof perhaps acquire their verdure. And from such solary irradiations may those wondrous varieties arise which are observable in animals. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vi. 12.

solast, n. A Middle English form of solace.

Solaster (sō-las'tēr), n. [NL., < L. sol, the sun, + aster, a star.] The typical genus of Solasteridae, having more than five rays. In S. endeca, a common North Atlantic species, there are usually eleven or ten slender, tapering, and smooth arms, and the whole surface is closely reticulated. The corresponding sun-star of the North Pacific is S. decemradiatus.

Sun-star (Solaster endeca).

Solasteridae (sō-las'tēr-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Solaster + -idae.] A family of starfishes, typified by the genus Solaster. The limits of the family vary, and it is sometimes merged in or called Echinasteridae. There are several genera, most of them with more than five rays, as in Solaster. In Cribrella (or Cribrella) the rays are six. In Crossaster papposus, a common sun-star of both coasts of the North Atlantic, there are twelve short obtuse arms, extensively united by a membrane on the oral surface, and the upper side is roughened with clubbed processes and spines. Echinaster sentus is five-armed (see cut at Echinaster). The many-armed sun-stars of the genus Heliaster (in some forms of which the rays are more than thirty in number) are brought under this family or referred elsewhere. Also written Solastriidae.

solatium (sō-lā'shū-um), n.; pl. solatia (-i). [L., also solacium, consolation, solace; see solace.] Anything that alleviates or compensates for suffering or loss; a compensation; specifically, in Scots law, a sum of money paid, over and above actual damages, to an injured party by the person who inflicted the injury, as a solace for wounded feelings.

sold<sup>1</sup> (sold). Preterit and past participle of sell<sup>1</sup>. sold<sup>2</sup>, n. [ME. solde, souldye, soude, souide, soid = MHG. sol, G. sol = Sw. Dan. sol, < OF. solde, soude, soude, F. solde, pay (of soldiers), = Sp. suelto = Pg. It. soldo, pay, < ML. solidus, soldum, pay (of soldiers); cf. OF. sol, sou, a piece of money, a shilling, F. sou, a small coin or value, = Pr. sol = Sp. suelto = Pg. It. soldo, a coin (see sol<sup>2</sup>, sou, soldo), < LL. solidus, a piece of money, ML. also in gen. money, < L. solidus, solid; see solid, solidus. Hence ult. soldier.] Pay (of soldiers, etc.); salary. Spenser, F. Q., II. ix. 6.

My Lord Treasurer granted the sold vij. c. marc to my Lord of Norfolk, for the arrears of his soude qeyl he was in Scotland. Paston Letters, I. 41.

Imparfit is the pope that al the people sholde helpe, And soudeth hem that sleeth such as he sholde saue. Piers Plowman (C), xxii. 431.

soldado (sōl-dā'dō), n. [Sp. soldado, a soldier; see soldier.] A soldier. Scott, Legend of Montrose, iii.

Come, help me; come, come, boys; soldadoes, comrades. Fletcher, Rule a Wife, iv. 3.

soldant, n. An obsolete form of sultan.

soldanel (sōl'da-nel), n. A plant of the genus Soldanella. Also written soldanelle.

Soldanella (sōl-dā-nel'ē), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700) soldanella, dim. of soldana, a plant so called, < OIt. solida, a coin; see soldo.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Primulaceae, the primrose family, and tribe Primulaceae. It is characterized by flowers with a five-parted calyx, a broadly funnel-shaped or somewhat bell-shaped corolla with fringed lobes, five stamens inserted on the corolla, and an ovoid ovary which becomes a circumscissile capsule with a five- to ten-toothed mouth, containing many seeds on an elongated central placenta. There are 4 species, alpine plants of Europe. They are smooth, delicate, stemless herbs, growing from a short perennial rootstock, and bearing long-stalked, fleshy, and entire roundish leaves with a heart-shaped base. The nodding flowers, single or umbel, are borne on a slender scape, and are blue, violet, rose-colored, or rarely white. S. alpina, growing near the snow-line on many European mountains, is, with other species, sometimes cultivated under the name soldanel or soldanella, and has been also called blue moonwort.

soldanriet, soldanryt, n. Obsolete forms of sultantry.

soldatesque (sōl-dā-tesk'), a. [F. soldatesque, < soldat, a soldier (see soldier), + -esque.] Of or relating to a soldier; soldier-like. [A Gallicism.]

His [the Captain's] came clanking on the pavement, or waving round him in the execution of military cuts and soldatesque manœuvres. Thackeray, Pendennis, xxii.

solder (sod'ér or sol'dér), n. [Early mod. E. also souder, soder, souder (dial. also sawder); < OF. soudure, soudure, soudure, soudure, F. soudure = Sp. Pg. soldadura = It. soldatura, a soldering, < OF. souder, souder, orig. **solder*, solder, consolidate, close or fasten together, = Pr. soldar, souder = Sp. Pg. soldar = It. soldare, sodare, < L. solidare, make firm, < solidus, solid, firm; see solid, and cf. soud<sup>1</sup>.] 1. A fusible alloy used for joining or binding together metal surfaces or joints, as the edges of tin cans, jewelry, and kitchen utensils. Being melted on each surface, the solder, partly by chemical attraction and partly by cohesive force, binds them together. After cleaning the edges to be joined, the workman applies a solution of zinc in hydrochloric acid and also powdered rosin to the cleaned surfaces; then he touches the heated soldering-iron to the rosin, and holding the solder-bar and iron over the parts to be joined melts off little drops of solder at intervals along the margins, and runs all together with the hot iron. There are many of these alloys, as soft solder used for tinware, hard solder for brass and iron, gold solder, silver solder, spelter solder, plumbers' solder, etc. Every kind is used at its own melting-point, which must always be lower than that of the metals to be united, soft solders being the most fusible.

To solder such gold, there is a proper glew or soder. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxxiii. 5.

Hence—2. Figuratively, that which unites in any way.

Friendship! mysterious cement of the soul,
Sweetener of life, and solder of society.

Aluminium solder. See aluminium.—Hard solder, solder which fuses only at red heat, and therefore is used only to unite the metals and alloys which can endure that temperature. Spelter solder and silver solder are the principal varieties.—Soft solder. (a) See def. 1. (b) Gross flattery or fulsome praise, particularly when used for selfish aims.

solder (sod'ér or sol'dér), v. t. [Early mod. E. also souder, soder, souder; < solder, n.] 1. To unite by a metallic cement; join by a metallic substance in a state of fusion, which hardens in cooling, and renders the joint solid.

I solder a metall with sowder. Je soude. Palegrave, p. 723.

2. Figuratively, to close up or unite firmly by any means.

As if the world should cleave, and that slain men Should solder up the Rift.
Shak., A. and C. (folio 1623), lii. 4. 32.

Would my lips had been soldered when I spake on't! B. Jonson, Epicoene, ii. 2.

solderer (sod'ér-ér or sol'dér-ér), n. [ < solder + -er.] One who or a machine which solders. soldering (sod'ér-ing or sol'dér-ing), n. [Verbal n. of solder, v.] 1. The act of one who or that which solders.—2. A soldered place or part.

Even the delicate solderings of the ends of these wires to the copper clips were apparently the same as ever. Elect. Rev. (Eng.), XXV. 349.

Autogenous soldering. See autogenous.—Galvanic soldering, the process of uniting two pieces of metal by means of another metal deposited between them through the agency of a voltaic current.—Soldering nipple. See nipple.

soldering-block (sod'ér-ing-blok), n. A tool employed in soldering cans, as a support and for trimming. It is adjustable for different sizes.

soldering-bolt (sod'ér-ing-bölt), n. Same as soldering-iron.

soldering-frame (sod'ér-ing-frām), n. A form of clamp for holding the parts together in soldering cans.

soldering-furnace (sod'ér-ing-fēr'nāns), n. A portable furnace used by tinnermen, etc., for heating soldering-irons.

soldering-iron (sod'ér-ing-i'ern), n. A tool with which solder is melted and applied. It consists of a copper bit or bolt, having a pointed or wedge-shaped end, fastened to an iron rod with a wooden handle. In some forms the copper bit is kept hot by means of a gas-flame supplied through a flexible pipe connected with the handle. See cut under solder.

soldering-machine (sod'ér-ing-mā-shēn'), n. In sheet-metal work, a general name for appliances and machines for closing the seams of tin cans with solder; also, a soldering-block, or any other machine or appliance rendering mechanical aid in soldering. The cans may be automatically dipped in molten solder, or the solder may be laid on the seams, which are then exposed to gas-flame, hot blast, or the direct heat of a furnace.

soldering-pot (sod'ér-ing-pot), n. A small portable furnace used in soldering, especially for uniting the ends of telegraph-wires. It is fitted with a clamp for holding the ends of the wires, etc., in position; and when they are in place the furnace is tilted, and the melted solder flows over the wires, etc., and forms a soldered joint.

soldering-tongs (sod'ér-ing-tōngz), n. sing. and pl. A flat-nosed tongs for brazing the joints of band-saws. The saw is held in a scarfing-frame, with a film of solder between the lapping scarfed edges. This film is melted by clamping the heated tongs over the edges. E. H. Knight.

soldering-tool (sod'ér-ing-tōl), n. A soldering-iron, or other tool for soldering.

solder-machine (sod'ér-mā-shēn'), n. A machine for forming molten solder into rods or drops for use.

soldi, n. Plural of soldo.

soldier (sōl'jēr), n. [Also dial. soger, sodger, sogjer; early mod. E. souldier, souldiour, souldiour; < ME. souldier, souldiour, soudiour, soudiour, soudioure, soudiour, soudier, soudoier, < OF. soldier, also soldoier, soldoier, souldoier, < ML. soldarius, a soldier, lit. 'one having pay,' < solidus, soldum, pay; see sold<sup>2</sup>. Cf. D. soldaat = G. Sw. Dan. soldat, < F. soldat, < It. soldato = Sp. Pg. soldado, a soldier, lit. 'one paid,' < ML. soldatus, pp. of soldare (> It. soldare = OF. solder), pay, < soldum, pay; see sold<sup>2</sup>.] 1. One who receives pay, especially for military service.

Bruyn the bere and ysegryn the wulf sente alle the londe a boutte yf ony man wolde take wages that they shold come to bruyn and he wolde paye them their souldye or wagis to fore. my fader ranne alle ouer the londe and bare the lettres. . . . My fader hadde ben ouerul in the lande bytwene the elue and the somme. And hadde gaten many a souldiour that shold the next somer haue comen to helpe bruyn. Caxton, Reynard the Fox (ed. Arber), p. 39.

2. A person in military service. (a) One whose business is warfare, as opposed to a civilian.

Madame, ge misdon . . .

To swiche a simpul souldiour as icham forto knele. William of Palerne (L. E. T. S.), l. 3051.

Fie, my lord, fie! a soldier, and afeard? Shak., Macbeth, v. 1. 40.

(b) One who serves in the land forces, as opposed to one serving at sea.

3. Hence, one who obeys the commands and contends in the cause of another.

Give me a favour, that the world may know
I am your soldier. Fletcher, Mad Lover, v. 4.

To continue Christ's faithful soldier and servant unto his life's end.

Book of Common Prayer, Public Baptism of Infants.

4. One of the rank and file, or sometimes including non-commissioned officers as opposed to commissioned officers.

He thinks it were meete that any one, before he come to be a captain, should have bene a soldiour. Spenser, State of Ireland.

That in the captain's but a cholerick word Which in the soldier is flat blasphemy.

Shak., M. for M., ii. 2. 131.

5. Emphatically, a brave warrior; a man of military experience, skill, or genius; a man of distinguished valor; one possessing the distinctive carriage, looks, habits, or traits of those who make a profession of military service: as, he is every inch a soldier.

So great a soldier taught us there
What long-enduring hearts could do
In that world's earthquake, Waterloo!

Tennyson, Death of Wellington.

6. In zool.: (a) One of that section of a colony of some kinds of ants which does the fighting, takes slaves, etc.; a soldier-ant. (b) The corresponding form in a colony of white ants or termites. (c) A soldier-beetle. (d) A sort of hermit-crab; also, a fiddler-crab.

Under those Trees [Sapadilles] we found plenty of Soldiers, a little kind of Animals that live in Shells, and have two great Claws like a Crab, and are good food. Dampier, Voyages, I. 39.

(e) The red gurnard, Trigla cuculus. [Local, Eng.] (f) A red herring. [British sailors' slang.]—7. One who makes a pretense of working, but is really of little or no use; one who works no more than is necessary to secure pay. See soger, 2. [Colloq.]—8. pl. A name of the red campion (Lychnis diurna), of the ribwort (Plantago lanceolata), and of various other plants. Britten and Holland, Eng. Plant Names. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]—Fresh-water soldier. See fresh-water.—Old soldier. (a) A bottle emptied at a banquet, carouse, etc. [Slang.] (b) The stump, or unsmoked part, of a cigar. See snipe, 3. [Slang.]—Red soldier, a disorder of pigs; rouget.

A disorder affecting pigs, called in France "rouget," and in Ireland "red soldier," from the red patches that appear on the skin in fatal cases. This affection depends on a bacillus. Lancet, 1890, II. 217.

Single soldier. See single.—Soldier of fortune, one who is ready to serve as a soldier wherever profit, honor, pleasure, or other advantage is most to be had.—Soldiers and sailors, soldier-beetles.—Soldier's wind (naut.), a fair wind for going and returning.—To come the old soldier over one, to impose upon one. [Colloq.]

I should think he was coming the old soldier over me, and keeping up his game. But no—he can scarce have the impudence to think of that.

Scott, St. Ronan's Well, xviii.

soldier (sōl'jēr), v. i. [< soldier, n.] 1. To serve as a soldier: as, to go soldiering.

Few nobles come. . . . Barras . . . is one. The reckless shipwrecked men; flung ashore on the coast of the Maldives long ago, while sailing and soldiering as Indian Fighters.

Carlyle, French Rev., III. 1. 7.

2. To bully; hector. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.] —3. To make a pretense or show of working, so as to be kept upon the pay-roll; shirk; feign sickness; malingering. See soger, 2. [Colloq.]

The two long times of men attached to the ropes on the last shore . . . stretch out ahead of us so far that it needs an opera-glass to discover whether the leaders are pulling or only soldiering.

C. D. Warner, Winter on the Nile, p. 248.

4. To make temporary use of (another man's horse). Thus, a man wanting a mount catches the first horse he can, rides it to his destination, and then lets it go. [Slang, Australia.] soldier-ant (sōl'jēr-ant), n. Same as soldier, 6 (a) (b).

soldier-beetle (sōl'jēr-bō'tl), n. Any beetle of Pennsylvania Soldier-beetle (Chauliognathus pennsylvanicus). a, larva, natural size; b, head of same, enlarged; c to d, mouth-parts, enlarged; e, beetle, natural size.

the family Telephoridae. The Pennsylvania soldier-beetle, Chauliognathus pennsylvanicus, is common in the soldier-bug (sōl'jēr-bug), n. A predaceous bug of the family Pentatomidae; any rapacious reduvioid. Podiscus spinosus is a common North American species known as the spined soldier-bug. It preys upon many destructive larvae, such as the fall web-worm, cutworms, and the larvae of the Colorado potato-beetle. The ring-banded soldier-bug is Perillus circuncinctus. The rapacious soldier-bug is Sinea diademata. See cuts under Pentatomidae, Perillus, Podiscus, Sinea, and Harpactor.

soldier-bush (sōl'jēr-bush), n. Same as soldier-wood.

soldier-crab (sōl'jēr-krah), n. A hermit-crab; a soldier.

soldieress (sōl'jēr-es), n. [< soldier + -ess.] A female soldier. [Rare.]

That equally canst pose sternness with pity.

Fletcher (and another), Two Noble Kinsmen, I. 1.

soldier-fly (sōl'jēr-flī), n. A dipterous insect of the family Stratiomyidae: so called from its ornamentation.

soldiering (sōl'jēr-ing), n. [Verbal n. of soldier, v.] 1. The state of being a soldier; the act or condition of serving as a soldier; military duty; campaigning.

The simple soldiering of Grant and Foose was solving some of the problems that confused scientific hypothesis.

The Century, XXXVI. 604.

2. The act of feigning to work; shirking. [Colloq.]

soldier-like (sōl'jēr-lik), a. Soldierly.

I will not say pity me; 'tis not a soldier-like phrase.

Shak., M. W. of W., II. 1. 13.

On hearing the general orders, he discharged a tempest of veteran, soldier-like oaths.

Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 316.

soldierly (sōl'jēr-li), a. [Early mod. E. souldierly; < soldier + -ly.] Like or befitting a soldier, especially in a moral sense: as, soldierly conduct.

He seem'd a souldierly person and a good fellow.

Ecelyn, Diary, June 15, 1675.

His own [face], the' keen and bold and soldierly,

Scard' by the close cultic, was not fair.

Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

soldier-moth (sōl'jēr-mōth), n. An East Indian geometrid moth, Euschima militaris.

soldier-orchid (sōl'jēr-ōr'kīs), n. A handsome orchid, Orchis militaris, of the northern Old World. It bears a dense oblong spike of small chiefly purple flowers. So named, perhaps, from the helmet-like adjustment of the sepals, or from its erect habit.

soldier's-herb (sōl'jēr-ērb), n. Same as matricol.

soldiership (sōl'jēr-ship), n. [< soldier + -ship.] The state of being a soldier; the qualities of a soldier, or those becoming a soldier; especially, skill in military matters.

His soldiership

Is twice the other twain.

Shak., A. and C., II. 1. 34.

soldierwood (sōl'jēr-wūd), n. A West Indian leguminous shrub, Calliandra purpurea. Its flowers are in heads, the stamens, as in the genus generally, united into a tube and long-exserted, forming the conspicuous part.

soldiery (sōl'jēr-i), n. [Early mod. E. souldiery, souldiouric; < soldier + -y.] 1. Soldier-ship; military service.

Hasline . . . inquired of his estate, adding promise of great reward, among the rest offering to him, if he would exercise his courage in soldiery, he would commit some charge unto him under his lieutenant Philanax.

Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, I.

To read a lecture of soldiery to Hannibal, the most cunningest warrior of his time.

Forc., Line of Life.

2. Soldiers collectively, whether in general, or in any state, or any army, camp, or the like.

They, expecting a sharp encounter, brought Sigebert, whom they esteem'd an expert Leader, with his presence to confirm the Soldiery.

Milton, Hist. Eng., IV.

The ferocious deeds of a savage and infuriated soldiery.

Cloy, Speech on Greek Rev.

soldo (sol'dō), n.; pl. soldi (-di). [< It. solido, n. coin: see sol<sup>2</sup>, solu.] A small Italian coin of copper or billon, the twentieth part of the lira; a sol or sou.

Obverse. Reverse. Billon Soldo of Peter Leopold, Grand Duke of Tuscany, 1778, in the British Museum. (Size of original.)

sole<sup>1</sup> (sōl), n. [< ME. sole, soale (of the foot or of a shoe); < AS. sol (pl. soles, for **solau*) = MD. solc, D. sool = MLG. solc, LG. solc = OIIG. solc, MFG. solc, sol, G. sohle = Icel. sōli = Sw. såla = Dan. suale = Goth. sulja, the sole of the foot, = OIt. suola, also suola, It. suola = Sp. suola = Pg. soia = Pr. soia, sol = F. sole, the sole of the foot, < ML. sola, a collateral form (found in glossaries) of L. solea, a slipper or sandal (consisting of a single sole fastened on by a strap across the instep), a kind of shoe for animals, also the sole of the foot (of animals), in ML, also the sole of a shoe, a flat under surface, the bottom, < solum, the ground, soil. Cf. soil<sup>2</sup>, sole<sup>2</sup>.] 1. The bottom or under side of the foot; technically, the plantar, corresponding to the palm of the hand. The sole of ordinary language does not correspond well with planta, except in the cases of plantigrades. In digitigrades sole usually means only that part of the planta which rests upon the ground in ordinary locomotion, or the balls of the toes collectively; it also applies to the fore as well as the hind feet of such quadrupeds, thus including the corresponding parts of the palm, or palm; while the planta may extend far up the hind leg (only), as to the hock of the horse. In the horse sole is restricted to the under side of the hoof of either fore or hind feet (see def. 4 (b)). In birds the sole of the foot is the under side of the toes taken together. See planta, and cuts under plantigrade, digitigrade, scutigerian, and solidungulate.

The sole of their [the cherubim's] feet was like the sole of a calf's foot. Ezek. I. 7.

2. The foot. [Rare.]

Fast wendred through the world now long a day,

Yett ceaseest not thy weary soles to tread.

Spenser, F. Q., I. x. 9.

3. That part of a shoe or boot which comes under the sole of the foot, and upon which the wearer treads. In boots and shoes with heels, the term is usually limited to the part that is in front of the heel and of nearly uniform thickness throughout. See half-sole, and cuts under boot<sup>2</sup> and poultine.

You have dancing shoes

With nimble soles. Shak., R. and J., I. 4. 15.

4. The part of anything that forms the bottom, and on which it stands upon the ground; the bottom or lower part of anything. (a) In agri., the bottom part of a plow, to the fore part of which is attached the point or share. (b) In farriery, the horny under side of any foot; the bottom of the hoof. (c) In fort., the bottom of an embrasure or gun-port. See embrasure, 2. (d) Naut., a piece of timber attached to the lower part of a rudder, to render it level with the false keel. (e) The seat or bottom of a mine: applied to horizontal veins or lodes. (f) The floor of a bracket on which a plumber-block rests. (g) The plate which constitutes the foundation of a marine steam-engine, and which is bolted to the keelson. (h) The floor or hearth of the metal chamber in a reverberatory, puddling, or boiling furnace. (i) In carp., the lower surface of a plane. (j) The bottom frame of a wagon, coach, or railway-car. (k) The metal shoe of a sled-runner. (l) The lower edge of a turbine. (m) In ship-building, the bottom plank of the cradle, resting on the bilgeways, and sustaining the lower ends of the poppets, which are mortised into the sole and support the vessel. See cut under launching-ways. E. H. Knight. (n) In coach., the surface of the body on which a gastropod creeps.

5. A flat surface like the sole of the foot.

The stones in the boulder-clay have a characteristic form and surface. They are usually oblong, have one or more flat sides or soles, are smoothed or polished, and have their edges worn round. A. Geikie, Encyc. Brit., X. 367.

compared to the form of a human sole; the dorsal and anal fins are very long, but free from the caudal, which has a rounded end, and pectorals are developed on both sides; the mouth is moderately recurved; the nostrils of the blind side are not inflated; and the height of the body is a little less than a third of the total length. The color is a dark brown, with a black spot at the end of the pectoral fin. This sole is common along the European coasts, and is one of the most esteemed of food-fishes. The flesh is white, firm, and of excellent flavor, especially when the fish has been taken in deep water. The average weight is about a pound, although the fish occasionally reaches a much larger size. It prefers sandy or gravelly shores, but retires into deep water when frost sets in. It feeds chiefly upon mollusks, but also on the eggs of fishes and other animals. It sometimes ascends into fresh water. There are other species, of several different genera, as Achirus lineatus, commonly called hog-choker. The name sole is also given to various species of the related family Pleuronectidae. Along the Californian coast the common sole is a pleuronectoid, Lepidogsetta bilineata, which reaches a length of about 20 inches and a weight of five or six pounds, although its average weight as seen in the markets is about three pounds. In San Francisco only about two per cent. of the flatfishes caught belong to this species, but along Puget Sound it constitutes about thirty per cent. of the catch. It feeds chiefly on crustaceans and small fishes, and is regarded as an excellent food-fish. Other Pleuronectidae called sole along the Pacific coast of North America are the Parophrys reticulatus and Hippoglossoides jordani. See also cuts under Pleuronectidae and Soleidae.

Though spoused, yet wanting wedlocks solemnize.
Spenser, F. Q., I. x. 4.

solemnizer (sol'ēm-nī-zēr), n. [solemnize + -er.] One who solemnizes; one who performs a solemn rite. Also spelled solennizer.

solemnly (sol'ēm-lī), adv. [ME. solemnly, solemnly, solenniche; < solemn + -ly.] In a solemn manner. (a) With religious ceremonies; reverently; devoutly.

And the angels before gan gang,
Singing all full solemnly,
And making nobill melody.
Holy Rood (L. T. S.), p. 72.

(b) With impressive seriousness.

I do solemnly assure the reader that he is the only person from whom I have heard that objection. Swift.

(c) With all due form; ceremoniously; formally; regularly: as, this question has been solemnly decided in the highest courts.

Now thou and I are new in nity,
And will to-morrow midnigh solemnly Dance in these Theseus' house triumphantly.
Shak., M. N. D., IV. 1. 63.

(d) With formal gravity, importance, or stateliness; with pompous or affected gravity.

His resous he spak full solemnly.
Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 274.

The ministers of state, who gave us law,
In corners, with selected friends, withdrew;
Here in deaf murmurs solemnly are wise. Dryden.

solemnness, n. See solemnness.

solemnity, n. [L. solennitas, pl. solennitas, a religious rite, festival solemnity, neut. of solennis, religious, solemn: see solemn.] Solemnity. [Rare.]

Else the glory of all these solemnities had perished like a blaze, and gone out, in the beholders' eyes.
B. Jonson, Masque of Hymen.

solempnet, a. An old spelling of solemn.

Solemya (sō-lem'i-jī), n. See Solenomya.

solen (sō'len), n. [NL., < L. solen, < Gr. σωλην, a channel, pipe, a kind of shell-fish, perhaps the razor-fish.] 1. In surp., same as cralle, 4 (b) (2).—2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of bivalve mollusks, typical of the family Solenidae, of which S. ruginosa, a common razor-fish of the North Atlantic, is the best-known species.—3. Any member of this genus, or a related form; a razor-clam, razor-fish, or razor-shell. See Solenidae, and cut under Ensis.

Solenacea (sol'ē-nā'sē-jī), n. pl. [NL., < Solen + -acea.] Same as Solenidae. Menke, 1828.

solenacean (sol'ē-nā'sē-an), a. and n. [Solenacea + -an.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the Solenacea or Solenidae; solenaceous.

II. n. A member of the Solenacea.
solenaceous (sol'ē-nā'shī-an), a. [NL. Solenacea + -ous.] Resembling a solen; belonging to the Solenacea; of or pertaining to the Solenidae.

solenarium (sol'ē-nā'ri-um), n.; pl. solenaria (-i). [NL., < Gr. σωλην, a channel, pipe, + -arium.] Either of the two (right and left) tubes of the spiral proboscis or ntilia of lepidopterous insects. Kirby and Spence.

solen-ark (sō'len-ārk), n. An ark-shell of the subfamily Solenellinae.

Solenella (sol'ē-nol'i), n. [NL., < Solen + -ella.] A genus of Ledidae, typical of the subfamily Solenellinae. Also called Malletia.

Solenellinae (sol'ē-ne-lī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Solenella + -inae.] A subfamily of Ledidae, characterized by the external ligament. Also called Malletinae.

solenness (sōl'nēs), n. The state of being sole, alone, or unconnected with others; singleness.

France has an advantage, . . . which is (if I may use the expression) its solenness, continuity of riches and power within itself, and the nature of its government. Chesterfield, (Latham).

solenette (sol'e-net'), n. [sol + -ette.] A fish, the little sole, or dwarf sole, Solca minuta or Menochirus linguatulus, a European flatfish, about 5 inches long, of a reddish-brown color on the upper side.

Solenhofen limestone. A rock quarried at Solenhofen (or Solnhofen) in Bavaria. It belongs to the Upper or White Jura, and is of the same geological age as the Kimmeridge group of England. It is remarkable as furnishing the world with the only really satisfactory lithographic stone, and as containing an extremely varied and well-preserved fauna, preëminent in the remains of the earliest known bird, the archæopteryx.

Solenidae (sō-len'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Fleming, 1828), < Solen + -idae.] A family of bivalve mollusks, typified by the genus Solen; the razor-shells: so called on account of the resemblance of the shell in form to a razor. The animal is elongate; the siphons are short and united; the foot is rather large and more or less cylindrical; the long slender shell has nearly parallel dorsal and ventral contours, and is truncate or subtruncate in front as well as behind, while the hinge is nearly or quite terminal and has usually a single tooth in each valve; and the pallial line has a deep sinus. The species are widely distributed and numerous, belonging to several genera. See cut under Ensis. Also Solenacea.

solenite (sol'e-nīt), n. [Gr. σωλην, a channel, pipe (see solen), + -ite.] A fossil razor-shell, or some similar shell.

solenocoench (sō-lō-nō-kōngk), n. [NL. Solenocoenchia.] A tooth-shell or dentaliid, as a member of the Selenocoenchia.

Solenocoenchia (sō-lō-nō-kōng'kē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σωλην, a channel, pipe, + κόγχη, a shell; see conch.] An order or a class of mollusks; the tooth-shells: so called from the tubular shell. As an order, the Solenocoenchia are the only order of the class Scaphopoda; as a class, the name is synonymous with the latter. See Dentaliidae. Also Prosopocéphala, Selenocoenchia.

Solenodon (sol'ē-nō-don), n. [NL. (Brandt, 1833), < Gr. σωλην, a channel, pipe, + ὄδον (ōdōn) = E. tooth.] 1. The typical and only genus of the family Solenodontidae, containing the opossum-shrews, S. paradoxus of Hayti and S. cubanus of Cuba, respectively called agouti and almiqui. They are insectivorous mammals, singularly resembling opossums, with a long cylindrical snout, long scaly tail, five toes on each foot, the fore feet with very long claws, the ears moderate and rounded, and the pelage long and harsh. See Solenodontidae. Also Selenodontia.

2. [l. c.] A species of this genus; a solenodont. See almiqui, and cut under agouti.

solenodont (sō-len'ō-dont), a. and n. [Solenodon (-t-).] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the Solenodontidae, or having their characters.

II. n. A solenodon.

Solenodontidae (sō-lō-nō-don'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Selenodon (-t-) + -idae.] A family of mammals, of the order Insectivora, peculiar to the West Indies. It is related to the Madagascar Centetidae, but has the pelage without spines, the penis abdominal, the testes perineal, the testis on the buttocks, the uterine horns ending in caecal sacs, the intestine without a caecum, the tibia and fibula distinct, the pubic symphysis short, the skull slender with an orbital constriction, small brain-case, large squamosal bones, mmular tympanics, no postorbital processes or zygomatic arches, and the dental formula characteristic. There is but one genus, Solenodon. See cut under agouti.

Solenogastrea (sō-lō-nō-gas'trē-jī), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Solenogastres.

Solenogastres (sō-lō-nō-gas'trēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σωλην, a channel, pipe, + γαστήρ, the belly.] A group proposed by Gegenbaur for the reception of the two genera Neomenia (with Proconomenia) and Charadodermis: now referred to the isopleurans Mollusca. See Isepleura, and cut under Neomenia.

solenoglyph (sō-lō-nō-glīf), a. and n. [Gr. σωλην, a channel, pipe, + γλῆφω, carve, cut; see glyph.] 1. a. Having apparently hollow or perforated maxillary tooth specialized and isolated from the rest; of or pertaining to the Solenoglyphia, or having their characters. These teeth are the venom-fangs of such serpents as vipers and rattlesnakes. They are not actually perforated, but have an involute groove whose lips roll together and fuse, forming a tube through which the poison is squirted when the snake strikes. See cut under Crotalus.

II. n. A solenoglyphic serpent.

Solenoglyphia, Solenoglyphia (sol'ē-nō-glīf'i-fī, sō-lō-nō-glīf'i-fī), n. pl. [NL.; see solenoglyph.]

The viperine or crotaliform serpents, a group of the order Ophidia, having the maxillary teeth few, canalculated, and fang-like. It includes some of the most venomous serpents, as the rattlesnakes or pit-vipers, and the true vipers or adders. Nearly all fall in the two families Crotalidae and Viperidae, though two others (Causidae and Atractaspididae) are recognized. See Proteroglypha, and cuts under adder, Crotalus, pit-viper, and rattlesnake.

solenoglyphic (sō-lē-nō-glīf'ik), a. [< solcuo-glyph + -ic.] Same as solenoglyph.

solenoid (sō-lē-noid), n. [< Gr. σωληνοειδής, pipe-shaped, grooved, < σωλην, a channel, pipe, + είδος, form.] A helix of copper or other conducting wire wound in the form of a cylinder so as to be nearly equivalent to a number of equal and parallel circular circuits arranged upon a common axis.

Solenoid.

The ends of the wire are brought to the middle point, and when a current is passed through the circuit the solenoid behaves, as far as external action is concerned, like a long and thin bar magnet. For this reason, such a magnet is called a solenoidal magnet; and Ampère's theory of magnetism is based on the assumption that magnets and solenoidal systems of currents are fundamentally identical.

A magnetic solenoid is an infinitely thin bar of any form longitudinally magnetized with an intensity varying inversely as the area of the normal section [that is, the cross-section perpendicular to the length] in different parts. J. E. H. Gordon, Elect. and Mag., I. 157.

solenoidal (sō-lē-nō'idāl), a. [< solenoid + -al.] Pertaining or relating to a solenoid; resembling a solenoid, or equivalent to a solenoid magnetically.—Solenoidal magnet. See magnet.

solenoidally (sō-lē-nō'idāl-i), adv. As a solenoid. Encyc. Brit., XV. 231.

Solenomya (sō-lē-nō-mi-ä), n. [NL., < Solen + Mya.] The typical genus of Solenomyidae; so called because supposed to combine characters of the genera Solen and Mya. Menke, 1830. Also Solenomya.

Solenomya togata (right valve).

Solenomyidae (sō-lē-nō-mi-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Solenomya + -idae.] A family of bivalve mollusks, typified by the genus Solenomya. The mantle-lobes are mostly united, with a single siphonal orifice and one pedal opening; the foot is elongated, and there is a pair of narrow appendiculate branchiae; the shell is equivalve, with a thin, spreading epidermis, toothless hinge, and internal ligament. These bivalves are sometimes called pod-gapers. Also Solenomyadæ (J. E. Gray, 1840) and Solenomyiæ.

solenostome (sō-lē-nō-stōm), n. [< Solenostomus.] A solenostomid.

Solenostomi (sō-lē-nōs'tō-mi), n. pl. A sub-order of lophobranchiate fishes with an anterior spinous dorsal and spinous ventral fins, including the family Solenostomidae.

Solenostomidae (sō-lē-nōs'tō-mi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Solenostomus + -idae.] A family of solenostomous lophobranchiate fishes, typified by the genus Solenostomus. An anterior high short spinous dorsal and a posterior low one are widely separated; the pectorals are inserted low on narrow bases, and the caudal is well developed. The few known species are peculiar to the Indo-Pacific ocean. The females carry their eggs under the belly, in a pouch formed by the ventral fins. Also Solenostomatidae.

solenostomid (sō-lē-nōs'tō-moid), a. and n. [< Solenostomus + -oid.] I. a. Of, or having characters of, the Solenostomidae; solenostomous.

II. n. A solenostome; any fish of the family Solenostomidae.

solenostomous (sō-lē-nōs'tō-mus), a. [< Gr. σωλην, a channel, pipe, + στόμα, mouth.] In icth., having a tubular or fistulous snout, as a pipe-fish of the genus Solenostomus; of or pertaining to the Solenostomi or Solenostomidae.

Solenostomus (sō-lē-nōs'tō-mus), n. [NL. (Lacépède, 1803), < Gr. σωλην, a channel, pipe, + στόμα, mouth.] The typical genus of Solenostomidae.

Solenostomus cyanopterus.

nostomidæ, including such species as S. cyanopterus. Also Solenostoma.

sole-piece (sōl'pēs), n. In mining, the lower part of a set or durnz. See the quotation under set, n., 13 (b).

sole-plate (sōl'plāt), n. 1. In mach., a bed-plate: as, the sole-plate of an engine.—2. In a water-wheel, the back part of a bucket. It is often formed by a continuous cylinder concentric with the axis of the wheel, and having the buckets built upon it. E. H. Knight.

Also called lobe-plate.

solert, n. A Middle English form of sollar.

sole-reflex (sōl'rē'fleks), n. See reflex.

soleret, n. See solleret.

solert (sōl'ert), a. [< L. sollers, less correctly solers (-ert), skilful, clever, crafty, < sollus, all (see solc), + ar(-t)-s, art, craft: see art<sup>2</sup>.] Crafty; subtle.

It was far more reasonable to think that, because man was the wisest (or most solert and active) of all animals, therefore he had hands given him.

solertiousness (sō-lēr'shus-nes), n. [*< *solertious (< L. sollertia, solertia, skill, cunning, < sollers, solers, skilful) + -ness.*] The quality of being solert; subtleness; expertness; cleverness; skill.

The king confessed that they had hit upon the interpretation of his secret meaning: which abounded to the praise of Mr. Williams' solertiousness.

Bp. Hacket, Abp. Williams, I. 22. (Davies.)

soleship (sōl'ship), n. [< solc<sup>3</sup> + -ship.] Limitation to only one individual; sole or exclusive right; monopoly. [Rare.]

The soleship of election, which, by the ancient canons, was in the bishops, they would have asserted wholly to themselves.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 222.

sole-tile (sōl'til), n. A form of tile used for bottoms of sewers, muffles, etc., of which the whole circumference is not in one piece. It is made flat or curved, according to the needs of the case. See cuts under sewer. E. H. Knight.

soleus (sō-lē-us), n.; pl. solei (-i). [NL., also solæus (and solea), < L. solea, the sole of the foot: see solc.] A broad flat muscle of the calf of the leg, situated immediately in front of (deeper than) the gastrocnemius. It arises from the back upper part of the fibula and tibia, and its tendon unites with that of the gastrocnemius to form the tendo Achillis.

The soleus is not a common muscle, and its great bulk in man, where it largely contributes to the swelling of the calf, is exceptional, and inversely proportionate to the smallness of the plantaris. See cuts under muscle and tendon.

soleynt, a. and n. A Middle English form of suleu.

sol-fa (sōl'fä), v. [In ME. solve, solfyce, < OF. solfer, F. solfer = Sp. solfear = Pg. solfejar, solfejar = It. solfeggiare, sing in gamut, sing by note, < sol + fa, names of notes of the gamut. Cf. solfeggio.] I. intrans. In music, to solmize, or sing solfeggio.

I have be prest and parsonyn passynge thretti wynter, yete can I neither solfe ne syngne ne seyntes luyes rede.

Piers Plowman (B), v. 423.

II. trans. In music, to sing to solmization-syllables instead of to words.

sol-fa (sōl'fä), n. and a. [See sol-fa, v.] I. n. In music: (a) The syllables used in solmization taken collectively; the act or process of solmization; solfeggio; also, rarely, same as scale or gamut.

As out of an alphabet or sol-fa.

Now was our overabundant quaver and trilling done away, and in lieu thereof was instituted the sol-fa.

Swift, Mem. of P. P.

(b) See tonic sol-fa, under tonic. (c) The roll or baton used by the leaders of Italian choirs.

II. a. Of or pertaining to solmization in singing: as, the sol-fa method, or tonic sol-fa method.

sol-faing (sōl'fä-ing), n. [Verbal n. of sol-fa, v.]

In music, same as solmization.

sol-faist (sōl'fä-ist), n. [< sol-fa + -ist.] In music, one who uses or advocates solmization.—Tonic sol-faist, one who uses the tonic sol-fa system (which see, under tonic).

The Tonic Sol-faists are now an integral part of the general musical life of the country.

solfanaria (sol-fä-nä-ri-ä), n. [It., < solfo, sulphur: see sulphur.] A sulphur-mine.

solfatara (sol-fä-tä-rä), n. [< It. solfatara, < solfo, sulphur: see sulphur.] An area of more or less corroded and disintegrated volcanic rock, over which sulphurous gases, steam, and other volcanic emanations escape through various orifices, frequently giving rise to what are known as mud-volcanoes, mud-cones, or salses; a region of dying or dormant volcanism. solfataric (sol-fä-tä-rik), a. [< solfatara + -ic.] Of or pertaining to or resembling a solfatara.

Solfataric gases still issue, and are regarded as the result of the solfataric action upon chromic iron.

Amer. Jour. Sci., 3d ser., XXXIX. 73.

solfeggio (sol-fej'io), n.; pl. solfeggii (-ii). [It., < sol + fa, names of notes of the gamut (see sol-fa), + -eggio, a common It. termination.] In music: (a) Same as solmization. (b) A vocal exercise consisting of tones variously combined in steps, skips, or running passages, sung either to simple vowels or to arbitrary syllables, and designed to develop the quality, flexibility, and power of the voice.

solferino (sol-fe-rē-nō), n. [So named from Solferino in Italy, because this color was discovered in the year (1859) of the French victory of Solferino. Cf. magenta.] The color of rosaniline; an intensely chromatic and luminous purplish rose-color. See purple.

sol, n. Italian plural of solo.

Solibranchia (sō-li-brang'ki-ä), n. pl. [NL., < L. solus, sole, + branchia, gills.] Fishes: a synonym of Pisces. Latreille.

solicit (sō-lis'it), v. [< ME. sollicitu, solleycten, < OF. sollicit, F. sollicit = Pr. sollicitar = Sp. Pg. sollicitar = It. sollicitare, sollicitare, < L. sollicitare, less correctly sollicitare, agitate, arouse, solicit, < sollicitus, less correctly sollicitus, agitated, anxious, punctilious, lit. 'thoroughly moved,' < OL. sollus, whole, entire (see solc), < L. solus, aroused, pp. of eiere, shake, excite, cite: see cite<sup>1</sup>. Cf. sollicitous.]

I. trans. 1. To arouse or excite to action; summon; invite; tempt; allure; entice.

That fruit . . . solicited her longing eye.

Sounds and some tangible qualities fall not to solicit their proper senses, and force an entrance to the mind.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. i. § 6.

2. In criminal law: (a) To incite (another) to commit a crime. (b) To entice (a man) in a public place: said of a prostitute. (c) To endeavor to bias or influence by the offer of a bribe.

The judge is solicited as a matter of course by the parties, and they do not approach empty-handed.

Brougham.

3. To disturb; disquiet; make anxious. [A Latinism.]

Solicit aot thy thoughts with matters hid.

But anxious fears solicit my weak breast.

Dryden, Spanish Friar, iii. 3.

4. To seek to obtain; strive after, especially by pleading; ask (a thing) with some degree of earnestness or persistency: as, to solicit an office or a favor; to solicit orders.

But, would you undertake another suit, I had rather hear you to solicit that Than music from the spheres.

To solicit by labour what might be ravished by arms was esteemed unworthy of the German spirit.

Gibbon, Decline and Fall, ix.

The port . . . was crowded with those who hastened to solicit permission to share in the enterprise.

Bancroft, Hist. U. S., I. 40.

Did I solicit thee From darkness to promote me?

6f. To advocate; plead; enforce the claims of; act as solicitor or advocate for or with reference to.

Should My brother henceforth study to forget The vow that he hath made me, I would ever Solicit thy desert.

Ford, Lover's Melancholy, v. 1.

Who solicited the cause of the poor and the infirm, the lame and wounded, the vagrant and lunatic, with such a particular industry and zeal as had those great and blessed effects which we at this day see and feel.

Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. ii.

=Syn. 4 and 5. Request, Beg, etc. (see ask<sup>1</sup>), press, urge, pray, plead for or with, sue for.

II. intrans. To make solicitation.

There are greater numbers of persons who solicit for places . . . in our own country, than in any other.

Addison, Frecholder, No. 48.

When the same distress solicits the second time, we then feel with diminished sensibility.

solicit (sō-lis'it), n. [< solicit, v.] Solicitation; request. [Rare.]

Frame yourself To orderly solicits.

Shak., Cymbeline, ii. 3. 52.

Within this hour he means his first solicit
And personal siege.

Shirley, Grateful Servant, l. 2.

solicitant (sō-lis'i-tānt), a. and n. [< L. sollicitant(-i)s, sollicitant(-i)s, ppr. of sollicitare, urgo, incite: see solicit.] 1. a. Solicitous; seeking; making petition: as, solicitant of a job. Eucyc. Dict.

II. n. One who solicits. Imp. Dict. solicitate (sō-lis'i-tāt), v. t. [< L. sollicitatus, sollicitatus, pp. of sollicitare, sollicitare, solicit: see solicit.] To solicit.

[He] did urge and solicitate him, according to his manner of words, to recruit.
Foxe, quoted in Maitland on Reformation, p. 434. (Davies.)

solicitate (sō-lis'i-tāt), a. [< L. sollicitatus, sollicitatus, pp.: see solicit.] Solicitons.

Being no less solicitate for them selves then meditative in what danger theyr felowes had byn in Rino Negro.
Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on America, ed. Arber, p. 121).

solicitation (sō-lis-i-tā'shən), n. [Formerly also sollitation; < OF. sollicitation, F. sollicitation = Sp. sollicitacion = Pg. sollicitação = It. sollicitazione, sollicitazione, < L. sollicitatio(n)-, sollicitatio(n)-, vexation, instigation, < sollicitare, sollicitare, pp. sollicitatus, urgo, incite, solicit: see solicit.] The act of soliciting. (a) Excitation; invitation; temptation; allurement; enticement; disturbing effect.

Children are surrounded with new things, which, by a constant solicitation of their senses, draw the mind constantly to them.
Locke.

The power of sustained attention grows with the ability to resist distractions and solicitations.
J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 33.

To use an old-fashioned expression of the first students of gravitation (an expression which has always seemed to me amusingly quaint), the solicitations of Jupiter's attractive force are as urgent on a swiftly rushing body as on one at rest.
N. J. Rice, CXXXIX, 115.

(b) In criminal law: (1) The inciting of another to commit a crime. (2) The enticing of a man by a prostitute in a public place. (3) Endeavor to influence by bribery.

The practice of judicial solicitation has even prevailed in less despotic countries.
Brougham.

(c) An earnest request; a seeking with some degree of zeal and earnestness to obtain something from another: as, the solicitation of a favor.

He was generally poor, and often sent bold solicitations to everybody, . . . asking for places, for money, and even for clothes.
Tegner, Span. Lit., l. 353.

(d) Advocacy.

So as ye may be sure to have of him effectual concurrence and advice in the furtherance and solicitation of your charges, whether the pope's holiness amend, remain long sick, or (as God forbid) should fortune to die.
Jp. Burnet, Hist. Ref., l. 11. 2.

solicitor (sō-lis'i-tēr), n. [< solicit + -er.] Same as solicitor.

I . . . thanke God that ye have occasion govyn unto you to be a solicitor and setter forth of such thynges as do and shall conserve my said ende.
Cardinal Wolsey, To S. Gardiner (Ellis's Hist. Letters, [1st ser., ciii.]).

solicitor (sō-lis'i-tor), n. [Early mod. E. solicitor, < OF. (and F.) sollicitator = Pr. sollicitador = Sp. Pg. sollicitador = It. sollicitatore, sollicitatore, < LL. sollicitator, sollicitator, a solicitor, first used in sense of 'a tempter, seducer,' ML. an advocate, etc., < L. sollicitare, sollicitare, urgo, incite, solicit: see solicit.] 1. A tempter; an instigator.

Appetite is the Will's solicitor, and the Will is Appetite's controller.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, l. 7.

2. One who solicits; one who asks with earnestness.

We single you
As our best-moving fair solicitor.
Shak., L. L. L., ll. 1, 29.

3. An advocate; specifically, one who represents a party in a court of justice, particularly a court of equity. Generally, in the United States, wherever the distinction between courts of law and of equity remains, practitioners in the latter are termed solicitors. In England solicitors are officers of the supreme court, and the mediators between barristers and the general public; they prepare causes for the barrister, and have a right of audience as advocates before magistrates at petty sessions, at quarter-sessions where there is no bar, in county courts, and in the bankruptcy court, but they cannot appear as advocates in any of the superior courts, or at assizes, or at any court of commission. Solicitors were at one time officers only of the court of chancery, but the term is now applied to all attorneys. In Scotland solicitors are of two classes—solicitors in the supreme court, who occupy a position similar to that of solicitors in England; and solicitors at law, who are members of a society of law-agents at Edinburgh, incorporated by royal charter and entitled to practise before inferior courts; they are also known by the name of procurators. Law-agents of both kinds in Scotland are now on an equal footing. Stater.

Be merry, Cassio,
For thy solicitor shall rather die
Than give thy cause away.

Shak., Othello, iii. 3. 27.

I take bishops to be the worst solicitors in the world.
Swift, Letter, Oct. 10, 1710.

City solicitor, in some of the United States, an officer having charge of the legal business of a municipality.—Crown solicitor. See crown.—Solicitor of the Treasury, an officer of the Treasury Department having charge of the prevention and punishment of all frauds, and the conduct of all suits involving the revenue of the United States, except those arising under the internal revenue laws of the United States, which are in charge of the Solicitor of Internal Revenue.

solicitor-general (sō-lis'i-tor-jen'e-ral), n.; pl. solicitors-general. 1. In England, an officer of the crown, next in rank to the attorney-general, with whom he is in fact associated in the management of the legal business of the crown and public offices. On him generally devolves the maintenance of the rights of the crown in revenue cases, patent causes, etc.—2. In Scotland, one of the crown counsel, next in dignity and importance to the lord advocate, to whom he gives his aid in protecting the interests of the crown, in conducting prosecutions, etc.—3. In the United States: (a) The second officer of the Department of Justice, who assists the attorney-general, and in his absence performs his duties. (b) A chief law officer of some of the States, corresponding to the attorney-general in others. W. C. Anderson, Law Dict.

solicitorship (sō-lis'i-tor-ship), n. [< solicitor + -ship.] 1. The office or status of solicitor.—2. A mock respectful title of address applied with a possessive pronoun to a solicitor. Compare the analogous use of lordship. [Rare.]

Your good solicitorship, and rogue Welborn, Were brought into her presence.
Macnager, New Way to Pay Old Debts, ll. 3.

solicitous (sō-lis'i-tus), a. [= Sp. sollicito = Pg. sollicito = It. sollecito, sollicito, < L. sollicitus, less correctly sollicitus, agitated, disturbed, anxious, careful: see solicit.] Anxious; concerned; apprehensive; eager, whether to obtain something desirable or to avoid something evil; very desirous; greatly concerned; disturbed; uneasy: as, a solicitous temper or temperament; generally followed by an infinitive, or by about, concerning, or for (less frequently of) before the object of anxiety or concern.

Ever suspicious, nuxious, solicitous, they are childishly drooping without reason. Burton, Annals of Mel., p. 161.

You are solicitous of the good-will of the meanest person, uneasy at his ill-will.
Emerson, Lays, 1st ser., p. 216.

solicitously (sō-lis'i-tus-li), adv. In a solicitous manner; anxiously; with care or concern.

solicitousness (sō-lis'i-tus-ness), n. The state of being solicitous; solicitude.

solicitress (sō-lis'i-tres), n. [< solicitor + -ess.] A female solicitor or petitioner.

Beauty is a good solicitress of an equal soul, especially where youth is to be the judge thereof.
Fuller, Worthies, Northamptonshire.

solicitrix (sō-lis'i-triks), n. [< solicitor, with necom. L. fem. term. -trix.] Same as solicitress. Davies.

solicitude (sō-lis'i-tūd), n. [< OF. sollicitudo, sollicitudo, F. sollicitude = Pr. sollicitut = Sp. sollicitud = Pg. sollicitude = It. sollicitudine, sollicitudine, < L. sollicitudo, sollicitudo, anxiety, < sollicitus, sollicitus, anxious, solicitous: see solicitous.] 1. The state of being solicitous; anxious care; carefulness; anxiety; concern; eager consciousness of mind lest some desired thing may not be obtained or some apprehended evil may happen.

The terseness and brilliancy of his diction, though not at all artificial in appearance, could not have been attained without labor and solicitude.
Whipple, Ess. mod. Rev., l. 141.

2. A cause or occasion of anxiety or concern.

Mrs. Todgers looked a little worn by cares of gravity and other such solicitudes arising out of her establishment.
Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit, xxii.

= SYN. Concern, Anxiety, etc. See care.

solicitudinous (sō-lis-i-tū'di-nus), a. [< L. sollicitudo, sollicitudo (-din-), sollicitude, + -ous.] Full of solicitude. [Rare.]

More circumspectly, not unreflectingly, and rather carefully solicitous than anxiously solicitudinous.
Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., l. 33.

solid (sol'id), a. and n. [Early mod. E. also solid; < ME. solide, < OF. solide, vernacularly saude, F. solide = Sp. sólido = Pg. sólido = It. solido, solido, < L. solidus, also contracted solidus, firm, dense, compact, solid; akin to OL. sollus, whole, entire, Gr. ὅλος, whole, entire, Skt.

sarva, all, whole: see solc. Hence ult. solid, soldo, sol, son, solder, soldier, consolidate, etc.] 1. a. 1. Resisting flexure; not to be bent without force; capable of tangential stress: said of a kind of material substance. See II., 1.

O, that this too, too solid flesh would melt, Thaw, and resolve itself into a dew!
Shak., Hamlet, i. 2. 123.

2. Completely filled up; compact; without cavities, pores, or interstices; not hollow: as, a solid ball, as distinguished from a hollow one; solid soda-water, not frothy.

With the solid darkness black Closing round his vessel's track.
Shelley, Lines written among the Euganean Hills.

3. Firm; strong: as, a solid pier; a solid wall. Doubtless a staunch and solid piece of framework as any January could freeze together.
Milton, Areopagitica, p. 40.

4. In bot., of a fleshy, uniform, undivided substance, as a bulb or root; not spongy or hollow within, as a stem.—5. In anat. and zool.: (a) Hard, compact, or firm in consistency; having no cavities or spongy structure: opposed to spongy, porous, hollow, cancellate, excavated, etc. (b) In cutan., specifically, formed of a single joint, or of several joints so closely applied that they appear to be one: especially said of the capitulum or club of capitate antennæ.—6. Having three dimensions; having length, breadth, and thickness: cubic: as, a solid foot contains 1,728 solid inches.—7. Sound; not weak; strong.

A solid and strong constitution of body, to bear the fatigue, Watts, Improvement of Mind. (Latham.)

A bottle or two of good solid Edifying Port, at honest George's, made a Night cheerful, and threw off Reserve.
Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, l. 193.

8. Substantial, as opposed to frivolous, fallacious, or the like; worthy of credit, trust, or esteem; not empty or vain; real; true; just; valid; firm; strong; hence, satisfactory: as, solid arguments; solid comfort; solid sense.

In solid content together they liv'd.
Robin Hood and Maid Marian (Child's Ballads, V. 375).

Not barren praise alone, that gaudy flower,
Fair only to the sight, but solid power.
Dryden, Abs. and Achil., l. 293.

9. Not light, trifling, or superficial; grave; profound.

The older an Author is, commonly the more solid he is, and the greater teller of Truth. Hawell, Letters, iv. 31.

These, wanting wit, affect gravity, and go by the name of solid men, and a solid man is, in plain English, a solid solemn fool. Dryden, (Johnson.)

This nobleman, being . . . of a very solid mind, could never be brought to understand the nature of my thoughts.
R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, xxvii.

10. Financially sound or safe; possessing plenty of capital; wealthy; well-established; reliable.

Solid men of Boston, banish long potatoes;
Solid men of Boston, make no long orations.
C. Morris, Pitt and Dundas's Return. From Lyra Urbana. (Garrett.)

11. Unanimous, or practically unanimous: as, a solid vote; the solid South. [Political slang, U. S.]—12. Without break or opening, as a wall or façade.

The apex, properly speaking, is a solid semidome, but always solid below, though generally broken by windows above.
J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., l. 475.

13. Smooth; even; unbroken; unvaried; unshaded: noting a color or pigment.—14. Without the liquor, as oysters: said in measuring: opposite to in liquor.—Pile solid, in her. See pile.—Solid angle. See angle.—Solid bath, a form of bath in which the body is enveloped in a solid or semisolid substance, as mud, hay, dung, peat, sand, or ashes.—Solid blow, cam, content, culture. See the nouns.—Solid bulb. See bulb, 1.—Solid color. (a) In decorative art, a color which invests the whole of an object, as a porcelain vase: more often used adjectively: as, solid-color porcelain; a collection of solid-color pieces. See def. 13. (b) With reference to fabrics, etc., a uniform color.—Solid geometry, green, harmonic. See the nouns.—Solid linkage. See linkage, 1.—Solid matter, in printing, matter set without leads between the lines.—Solid measure. Same as cubic measure (which see, under measure).—Solid number, an integer having three prime factors.—Solid problem, a problem which virtually involves a cubic equation, and can therefore not be solved geometrically by the rule and compass alone.—Solid South. See South.—Solid square (solid). See square, 1.—To be solid for, to be thoroughly in favor of; to be influencing in support of. [Slang, U. S.]

"Lyra, don't speak of it." "Never!" said Mrs. Wilmington, with delight. "I'm solid for Mr. Peck every time."
Howells, Annie Kilburn, xviii.

To be or make one's self solid with, to be or put one's self on a firm or satisfactory footing with; have or secure the unflinching favor or support of: as, to be solid with the police; to make one's self solid with those in authority or power. [Slang, U. S.]

solid

In nine cases out of ten, we thus succeeded in making ourselves "solid with the administration" before we had been in a town or village forty-eight hours.

The Century, XXXVII. 30.

=Syn. 1. Dense.—8. Stable, weighty, important.

II. n. 1. A body which throughout its mass (and not merely at its surface) resists for an indefinite time a sufficiently small force that tends to alter its equilibrium figure, always springing back into shape after the force is removed; a body possessing elasticity of figure. Every such body has limits of elasticity, and, if subjected to a strain exceeding these limits, it takes a set and does not return to its original shape on being let go. This property is called plasticity. The minimum energy required to give a set to a body of definite form and size measures its resilience. When the resilience of a body is small and masks its springiness, the body is called soft. Even fluids transmit shearing forces if time be allowed, and many substances will yield indefinitely to very small (but not indefinitely small) forces applied for great lengths of time. So solids that have received a small set will sometimes partially recover their figures after a long time. This property in fluids is called viscosity, in solids after-effect (German nachwirkung). The phenomenon is connected with a regrouping of the molecules, and indicates the essential difference between a solid and a liquid. In fluids diffusion is continually active, and in gases it produces phenomena of viscosity. In liquids it is not rapid enough to give rise to sensible viscosity, but the free motion of the molecules makes the body fluid, while the tendency of sets of molecules to continue for a while associated makes the fluidity imperfect. In solids, on the other hand (at least when not under strain), there is no diffusion, and the molecules are consequently in stationary motion or describing quasi-orbits. They thus become grouped in the mode in which they have least positional energy consistent with their kinetic energy. When this grouping is slightly disturbed, it tends to restore itself; but when the disturbance is greater, some of the molecules will tend to return to their old places and others to move on to new situations, and this may give rise to a new permanent grouping, and exhibit the phenomenon of plasticity. But if not quite sufficient for this, disturbances of the molecular motions somewhat similar to the secular perturbations of the planets will result, from which there will be no restoration for a very long time. Solid bodies are very strongly cohesive, showing that the molecules attract one another on the whole; and they are generally capable of crystallization, showing that the attractions of the molecules are different in different directions.

2. In geom., a body or magnitude which has three dimensions—length, breadth, and thickness—being thus distinguished from a surface, which has but two dimensions, and from a line, which has but one. The boundaries of solids are surfaces. Besides the three round bodies (the sphere, cone, and cylinder), together with the conoids, and the pyramids, prisms, and prismatoids, the most important geometrical solids are the five Platonic and the Kepler-Poinsot regular polyhedra, the two semi-regular solids, and the thirteen Archimedean solids. The faces, edges, or summits of one solid are said to correspond with the faces, edges, or summits of another when the radii from the center of the former to the mid-faces, mid-edges, or summits can be simultaneously brought into coincidence with the radii from the center to the mid-faces, mid-edges, or summits of the latter. If two solids correspond faces to summits, summits to faces, and edges to edges, they are said to be reciprocal. If to the edges of one solid correspond the faces or summits of another, while to the faces and summits together of the former correspond the summits or faces of another, the latter is said to be the summital or facial holohedron of the former. The regular tetrahedron is the reciprocal of itself, and its reciprocal holohedron are the cube and octahedron. The reciprocal holohedron of these, again, are the semi-regular dodecahedron and the cuboctahedron. The facial holohedron of these, again, is the small rhombicuboctahedron. The faces of the truncated cube and truncated octahedron correspond to those of the cuboctahedron. The snub-cube has faces corresponding to the cuboctahedron, and twenty-four faces which in two sets of twelve correspond to the summits of two other cuboctahedra. The faces of the great rhombicuboctahedron correspond to those of the small rhombicuboctahedron. Just as the cube and octahedron are reciprocal, so likewise are the Platonic dodecahedron and icosahedron, though they are related to no hemihedral body like the tetrahedron. Their reciprocal holohedra are the semi-regular tricaenahedron and the icosidodecahedron, and the facial holohedron of these, again, is the small rhombicuboctahedron. The faces of the truncated dodecahedron and truncated icosahedron correspond to those of the icosidodecahedron. The snub-dodecahedron has faces corresponding to those of the icosidodecahedron, and two sets of others corresponding to the summits of two other icosidodecahedra. The faces of the great rhombicuboctahedron correspond to those of the small rhombicuboctahedron. The faces, summits, and edges of the great icosahedron and great stellated dodecahedron correspond respectively to the faces, summits, and edges of the Platonic dodecahedron and icosahedron. The great dodecahedron and small stellated dodecahedron are self-reciprocal, both faces and summits corresponding to the faces of the Platonic dodecahedron or summits of the icosahedron. The faces of the truncated tetrahedron correspond to the faces of the octahedron or summits of the cube.

3. pl. In anat., all parts of the body which are not fluid; as, the solids and fluids of the body.

4. pl. In printing, the parts of an engraving which show black or solid in print.—Archimedean, rectangular, right solid. See the adjectives.—Cissoidal solid, a solid generated by the rotation of this cissoid about its axis.—Kepler solid, or Kepler-Poinsot solid, a regular solid which wraps its center more than once. There are four such solids—the great icosahedron, the great dodecahedron, the small stellated dodecahedron, and the great stellated dodecahedron. Three of them were mentioned by Kepler, and all were rediscovered by Poinsot. The names here used were given by Cayley.—Logistic solid, a solid generated by the revolution of a logarithmic curve about its asymptote.—Plastic solid, a solid substance whose limit of elasticity is far below its point of rupture, so that it can be shaped; thus, putty and wrought-iron are plastic solids.—Platonic solid, one of the old regular solids which wrap the center only once. They are five—the tetrahedron, the cube, the octahedron, the twenty-vertexed dodecahedron, and the icosahedron.—Regular solid, a polyhedron whose faces are regular polygons, all alike.—Semi-regular solid, a body whose edges are all of equal length, whose faces are all alike and equally incline to one another at the edges, but whose faces are not regular polygons. Two such solids are known—the rhombic dodecahedron and tricaenahedron.—Solid of least resistance. See resistance.—Solid of revolution. See revolution.

Solidago (sol-i-dá'gō), n. [NL. (Vaillant, 1720), < ML. solidago, goldenrod (Solidago Virgaurea), so called from its reputed vulnerary qualities, < L. solidus, solid; see solid.] 1. A genus of compositae plants, the goldenrods, of the tribe Asteroidae and subtribe Homochromae, sometimes made the type of a further subdivision, Solidagineae (De Candolle, 1836). It is characterized by several-flowered small and radiate yellow heads, with a small but usually alveolate receptacle, and an oblong involucre of erect rigid bracts which are closely imbricated in several rows and are without herbaceous tips. The oblong or obovate five- to twelve-ribbed achenes bear copious whitish pappus of long and nearly equal slender bristles. From Aster which it closely resembles in technical characters, it is distinguished by its taller more robust habit, yellow rays, smaller heads, and the absence of cordate leaves; from Chrysopsis and Haplopappus by its narrow few-flowered heads; and from Diglossa, its other most important near relative, by the presence of rays. The species have in general a very characteristic habit, being perennial herbs, usually with strictly erect unbranched stems, which bear numerous entire or serrate alternate sessile narrow stem-leaves and broader root-leaves, which taper into margined petioles. Numerous intermediate forms render many species difficult to distinguish. In the original species, S. Virgaurea, the golden-yellow flowers are massed in small clusters which form an elongated or interrupted spike, whence the popular name goldenrod. The typical inflorescence, however, is a terminal pyramidal panicle of determinate development, composed of numerous recurring and scorpioid one-sided racemes, best seen in S. Canadensis and S. rugosa. In other species the flowers form a dense thyrsus of straight and terete crowded racemes, as S. speciosa, of the Atlantic and interior United States. A few others from the Ohio and Mississippi valleys, as S. rigida, produce nearly level-topped cymes. Four other cymose species were formerly separated as a genus, Euthamia (Nuttall, 1818), distinguished by lack of scorpioid branchlets and by their linear entire one- to five-nerved leaves, including the widely distributed species S. lanceolata and S. Caroliniana (S. tenuifolia), and connecting with S. pauciflorosa, of the Southern States and the Bahamas, formerly separated as a genus, Chrysoma (Nuttall, 1840), because of its shrubby stem and few-flowered heads with one to three rays. Several other species are slightly aberrant: S. multiradiata, of the Rocky Mountains, sometimes has twelve rays, others usually five; S. discoides, a racemose Gulf species, is wholly without rays and has a purplish pappus; this, with S. squarrosa of northern rocks and S. petiolaris of southern pine-barrens, varies also in the spreading tips of the involucre bracts. S. bicolor is remarkable for its cream-colored flowers. S. verna, of pine-woods near Wilmington, North Carolina, blooms in May; S. uliginosa, of northern peat-bogs, in July; S. juncea and S. elliptica in August; and S. rugosa, S. Canadensis, and most others mainly in September; S. nemoralis and S. ca-

sta continue well into October. The genus is one of the most characteristic of the United States, numerous both in species and in individuals, and not entirely wanting in any region. In the northern and central States it gives to the landscape much of its beauty, and is an important element of the prevailing yellow of autumn. There are nearly 100 species, of which 80, besides more than 30 important varieties, are natives of the United States, and the others are nearly all American, 9 of them occurring in Mexico, 2, 3, or 5 in South America (3 in southern Brazil, 2 in Uruguay, and 1 in Chile), and 1 in Hayti. Only 2 species are natives of the Old World, S. littoralis, limited to the Tuscan and Ligurian coast, and S. Virgaurea, which extends from Mount Parnassus north and west throughout Europe and into Siberia, Alaska, New York, and New England, in many widely differing varieties. Those of the United States are all, with 5 exceptions, confined to them and to British America (into which 2 extend), and are mainly natives of the Atlantic and central States. Numerous isolated species are southern; the northern are mostly of wider distribution and more abundant in individuals; 11 species are mainly confined to the high northern, 12 to the northeastern, 24 to the southern, 8 to the southwestern, 10 to the Pacific States; 9 belong to the Mississippi valley, of which S. Missouriensis is the only one widely distributed; 2 species, S. odora and S. sempervirens, extend throughout the Atlantic coast from Canada to Mexico, and the latter, the salt-marsh goldenrod, reappears at the Azores and at San Francisco. Forty-two species occur in the northeast quarter of the United States, 53 in the Southern States, and about 14 among the Rocky Mountains. S. Canadensis, the most numerous and most typical species, is also the one most widely diffused through the United States, followed next by S. nemoralis and S. rugosa. The species of this genus range from beyond 66° N. latitude to the city of Mexico, and from alpine summits to the sea-level; several are mostly confined to swamps, as S. patula, and a few to woodland borders, as S. caesia and S. bicolor, but most are plants of dry open soil, especially S. nemoralis. In parts of the Atlantic coast the name goldenrod is locally confined to S. odora, the sweet goldenrod of authors, which contains in its dotted leaves an aromatic and stimulating volatile oil of an anisate odor and pale greenish-yellow color; it is also carminative and diaphoretic, and its infusion is used to relieve spasmodic pains and nausea; its dried flowers and leaves have been employed as a beverage, under the name of Blue-Mountain tea. S. Virgaurea, the goldenrod of Europe, contains an astringent and tonic principle, and was long in esteem for healing wounds, herbalists of two and three centuries ago pronouncing it "one of the most noble wound-herbs," and prescribing "a tea of the young leaves, green or dry." It was also once in repute in Europe as a dyo, and a variety of S. nemoralis is locally called dyer's-weed in America. S. canadensis and others have been popularly known as yellow-weed, and S. rugosa as bitterweed. S. rigida is also a reputed astringent. The goldenrod has been recommended by many as the national emblem of the United States.

2. [l. c.] A plant of this genus; goldenrod.
solidare (sol-i-dār'), n. [Appar. < F. solidaire, solid (see solidary), with sense of ML. solidus, a piece of money: see solidus, soldo, sol.] A small piece of money.

Here's three solidares for thee; good boy, wink at me, and say thou sawest me not. Shak., T. of A., III. 1. 46.

solidaric (sol-i-dar'ik), a. [Irreg. < solidary + -ic.] Characterized by solidarity. [Rare.]

In the very nature of things family supremacy will be absolutely incompatible with an interdependent solidaric commonwealth. The Century, XXXI. 745.

solidarité (sol-ē-dar-ē-tā'), n. [F.: see solidarity.] In French law: (a) The relation among co-debtors who are jointly and severally bound—that is, may be held jointly or severally at the option of the creditor. (b) The relation among co-creditors holding an obligation which gives expressly to each of them the right to demand payment of the entire debt, so that a payment made to any one will discharge the debt.

solidarity (sol-i-dar'i-ti), n. [F. solidarité (= Sp. solidaridad = Pg. solidariedade), joint liability, mutual responsibility, < solidaire, solid: see solidary.] Mutual responsibility existing between two or more persons; communion of interests and responsibilities.

Solidarity, a word which we owe to the French communists, and which signifies a fellowship in gain and loss, in honour and dishonour.

French, English Past and Present, p. 53.

Strong government came in with the sixteenth century, and strong government was a very strong element in reformation history, for it weakened the solidarity of the Catholic Church.

Which melts so soon away
With the Sun's Ray,
Thy verse does solidate and crystallize.

Cowley, Pindaric Odes, IV. 3.

solid-drawn (sol'id-drān), a. In metal-working, drawn from hollow ingots, in which mandrels of constantly decreasing diameter are successively inserted, till both exterior and interior diameters are brought down to the required dimensions.

solid-hoofed (sol'id-hūft), a. Solidungulate or soliped; whole-hoofed; not cloven-hoofed. See ent under solidungulate.

solid-horned (sol'id-hōrnd), a. Having solid deciduous horns or antlers, as deer; not hollow-horned. The solid-horned ruminants are the deer tribe. See Cervidae and Tragulidae.

solidi, n. Plural of solidus.

solidifiable (sō-lid'i-fī-ā-bl), a. [< solidify + -able.] Capable of being solidified or rendered solid.

solidification (sō-lid'i-fī-kā'shon), n. [< solidify + -ation (see -fy).] The act or process of making solid; specifically, in physics, the passage of a body from a liquid or gaseous to a solid state. It is accompanied by evolution of heat without a decrease of temperature, and by change of volume.

solidify (sō-lid'i-fī), v.; pret. and pp. solidified, ppr. solidifying. [< F. solidifier = Sp. Pg. solidificar; as solid + -fy.] I. trans. To convert from a liquid or gaseous state to a solid state; make solid or compact: as, to solidify hydrogen.

II. intrans. To become solid or compact: as, water solidifies into ice through cold.

solidism (sol'i-dizm), n. [< solid + -ism.] In med., the doctrine that refers all diseases to alterations of the solid parts of the body. It rests on the opinion that the solids alone are endowed with vital properties, and that they only can receive the impression of morbid agents and be the seat of pathological phenomena. Opposed to Galenism or humorism.

solidist (sol'i-dist), n. [< solid + -ist.] One who believes in or maintains the doctrine of solidism.

solidistic (sol-i-dis'tik), a. [< solidist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the solidists.

It is perhaps natural that we should revert to the solidistic notion of the all-pervading influence of the nervous system. Lancet, 1889, II. 1123.

solidity (sō-lid'i-ti), n. [< F. solidité = Pr. soliditat = It. solidità, < L. soliditas (t)-s, < solidus, solid: see solid.] 1. The state or property of being solid. Specifically—(a) The property of resisting a force tending to change the figure of a body: opposed to fluidity.
(b) The idea of solidity we receive by our touch; and it arises from the resistance which we find in a body to the entrance of any other body into the place it possesses till it has left it. Locke, Human Understanding, II. IV. 1.

(c) The absolute impenetrability attributed by some metaphysicians to matter. [This use of the word is almost peculiar to Locke. Sir W. Hamilton attributes eight physical meanings to the word—the property of occupying space; extension in three dimensions; absolute impenetrability; great density; relative immovability; weight; hardness; and non-fluidity.] (d) Fullness of matter: opposed to hollowness. (e) Massiveness; substantiality; hence, strength; stability.

These towers are of tremendous girth and solidity; they are encircled with great bands, or hoops, of white stone, and are much enlarged at the base.

H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 93.

(f) Strength and firmness in general; soundness; strength; validity; truth; certainty.

They answered the objections with great strength and solidity of argument. Addison, Tatler, No. 116.

The very laws which at first gave the government solidity. Goldsmith, Polite Learning, I.

2. In geom., the quantity of space occupied by a solid body. Also called its solid or cubic content or contents. The solidity of a body is estimated by the number of cubic inches, feet, yards, etc., which it contains.

3†. A solid body or mass. [Rare.]

Heaven's face doth glow;

Yea, this solidity and compound mass,

With trifling visage, as against the doom,

Is thought-sick at the act. Shak., Hamlet, III. 4. 43.

Measure of solidity. See measure.

solidly (sol'id-li), adv. In a solid manner, in any sense of the word solid. (a) Firmly; densely; compactly: as, the parts of a pier solidly united. (b) Securely; truly; on firm grounds. (c) In a body; unambiguously: as, the Democrats voted solidly against the bill. [Colloq.]

solidness (sol'id-nēs), n.

1. The state or property of being solid; solidity.

2. Soundness; strength; truth; validity, as of arguments, reasons, principles, etc.

solidum (sol'i-dum), n. [L. solidum, a solid substance, neut. of solidus, firm, compact: see solid.] 1. In arch., the die of a pedestal. See ent under dado.—2. In Scots law, a complete sum.—To be bound in solidum, to be bound for the whole debt, though only one of several obligants. When several debtors are bound each for a proportionate share only, they are said to be bound pro rata.

Solidungula (sol-i-dung'gū-lā), n. pl. [NL. (Elmuenbach, about 1799), neut. pl. of solidungulus: see solidungulus.] The solid-hoofed, soliped, or solidungulate perissodactyl mammals, corresponding to the family Equidae.

Solidungular (sol-i-dung'gū-lār), a. [NL. "solidungularis", < L. solidus, solid, + ungula, hoof.] Same as solidungulate.

The closeness and solidness of the wood.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 325.

2. Soundness; strength; truth; validity, as of arguments, reasons, principles, etc.

Solidungulus (sol-i-dung'gū-lūs), n. pl. [NL. (Elmuenbach, about 1799), neut. pl. of solidungulus: see solidungulus.] The solid-hoofed, soliped, or solidungulate perissodactyl mammals, corresponding to the family Equidae.

Solidungular (sol-i-dung'gū-lār), a. [NL. "solidungularis", < L. solidus, solid, + ungula, hoof.] Same as solidungulate.

Solidungulate (sol-i-dung'gū-lāt), n. pl. [NL. (Elmuenbach, about 1799), neut. pl. of solidungulus: see solidungulus.] The solid-hoofed, soliped, or solidungulate perissodactyl mammals, corresponding to the family Equidae.

Solidungular (sol-i-dung'gū-lār), a. [NL. "solidungularis", < L. solidus, solid, + ungula, hoof.] Same as solidungulate.

Solidungulus (sol-i-dung'gū-lūs), n. pl. [NL. (Elmuenbach, about 1799), neut. pl. of solidungulus: see solidungulus.] The solid-hoofed, soliped, or solidungulate perissodactyl mammals, corresponding to the family Equidae.

Solidungular (sol-i-dung'gū-lār), a. [NL. "solidungularis", < L. solidus, solid, + ungula, hoof.] Same as solidungulate.

Solidungulate (sol-i-dung'gū-lāt), n. pl. [NL. (Elmuenbach, about 1799), neut. pl. of solidungulus: see solidungulus.] The solid-hoofed, soliped, or solidungulate perissodactyl mammals, corresponding to the family Equidae.

Solidungular (sol-i-dung'gū-lār), a. [NL. "solidungularis", < L. solidus, solid, + ungula, hoof.] Same as solidungulate.

Solidungulus (sol-i-dung'gū-lūs), n. pl. [NL. (Elmuenbach, about 1799), neut. pl. of solidungulus: see solidungulus.] The solid-hoofed, soliped, or solidungulate perissodactyl mammals, corresponding to the family Equidae.

Solidungular (sol-i-dung'gū-lār), a. [NL. "solidungularis", < L. solidus, solid, + ungula, hoof.] Same as solidungulate.

Solidungulate (sol-i-dung'gū-lāt), n. pl. [NL. (Elmuenbach, about 1799), neut. pl. of solidungulus: see solidungulus.] The solid-hoofed, soliped, or solidungulate perissodactyl mammals, corresponding to the family Equidae.

Solidungular (sol-i-dung'gū-lār), a. [NL. "solidungularis", < L. solidus, solid, + ungula, hoof.] Same as solidungulate.

Solidungulus (sol-i-dung'gū-lūs), n. pl. [NL. (Elmuenbach, about 1799), neut. pl. of solidungulus: see solidungulus.] The solid-hoofed, soliped, or solidungulate perissodactyl mammals, corresponding to the family Equidae.

Solidungular (sol-i-dung'gū-lār), a. [NL. "solidungularis", < L. solidus, solid, + ungula, hoof.] Same as solidungulate.

Solidungulate (sol-i-dung'gū-lāt), n. pl. [NL. (Elmuenbach, about 1799), neut. pl. of solidungulus: see solidungulus.] The solid-hoofed, soliped, or solidungulate perissodactyl mammals, corresponding to the family Equidae.

Solidungular (sol-i-dung'gū-lār), a. [NL. "solidungularis", < L. solidus, solid, + ungula, hoof.] Same as solidungulate.

Solidungulus (sol-i-dung'gū-lūs), n. pl. [NL. (Elmuenbach, about 1799), neut. pl. of solidungulus: see solidungulus.] The solid-hoofed, soliped, or solidungulate perissodactyl mammals, corresponding to the family Equidae.

Solidungular (sol-i-dung'gū-lār), a. [NL. "solidungularis", < L. solidus, solid, + ungula, hoof.] Same as solidungulate.

Solidungulate (sol-i-dung'gū-lāt), n. pl. [NL. (Elmuenbach, about 1799), neut. pl. of solidungulus: see solidungulus.] The solid-hoofed, soliped, or solidungulate perissodactyl mammals, corresponding to the family Equidae.

Solidungular (sol-i-dung'gū-lār), a. [NL. "solidungularis", < L. solidus, solid, + ungula, hoof.] Same as solidungulate.

Solidungulus (sol-i-dung'gū-lūs), n. pl. [NL. (Elmuenbach, about 1799), neut. pl. of solidungulus: see solidungulus.] The solid-hoofed, soliped, or solidungulate perissodactyl mammals, corresponding to the family Equidae.

Solidungular (sol-i-dung'gū-lār), a. [NL. "solidungularis", < L. solidus, solid, + ungula, hoof.] Same as solidungulate.

Solidungulate (sol-i-dung'gū-lāt), n. pl. [NL. (Elmuenbach, about 1799), neut. pl. of solidungulus: see solidungulus.] The solid-hoofed, soliped, or solidungulate perissodactyl mammals, corresponding to the family Equidae.

Solidungular (sol-i-dung'gū-lār), a. [NL. "solidungularis", < L. solidus, solid, + ungula, hoof.] Same as solidungulate.

Solidungulus (sol-i-dung'gū-lūs), n. pl. [NL. (Elmuenbach, about 1799), neut. pl. of solidungulus: see solidungulus.] The solid-hoofed, soliped, or solidungulate perissodactyl mammals, corresponding to the family Equidae.

Solidungulate (sol-i-dung'gū-lāt), n. pl. [NL. (Elmuenbach, about 1799), neut. pl. of solidungulus: see solidungulus.] The solid-hoofed, soliped, or solidungulate perissodactyl mammals, corresponding to the family Equidae.

Solidungula (sol-i-dung'gū-lā'tū), n. pl. Same as Solidungulus.

Solidungulate (sol-i-dung'gū-lāt), a. and n. [< NL. solidungulatus, < L. solidus, solid, + ungula, hoof: see ungulate.] I. a. Solid-hoofed or whole-boofed, as the horse; of or pertaining to the Solidungula; equine. Also soliped, solipedal, solidungular, solidungulous. See ent in preceding column, and ent under hoof and Perissodactyla.

II. n. A member of the Solidungula, as the horse or ass; an equine. Also soliped, solipedal.

Solidungulous (sol-i-dung'gū-lūs), a. [< NL. solidungulus, < L. solidus, solid, + ungula, a hoof: see ungulate.] Same as solidungulate. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 2.

Solidus (sol'i-dus), n.; pl. solidi (dī). [LL., an imperial gold coin, ML. applied to various coins, also any piece of money, money (see def.), lit. 'solid' (see nummus, coin): see solid. Cf. soldo, sol, sol, sol.] 1. A gold coin introduced by Constantine the Great to take the place of the aureus, previously the chief coin of the Roman currency. The coin weighed about 70 grains, and 72 solidi were struck to the pound. The solidus continued to be coined under the Byzantine empire, and at a later period received in western Europe the name of bezant. (See bezant.) In the middle ages the word solidus often indicates not any special coin, but a money of account, and was translated in the Teutonic languages by shilling and its cognates. Generally, the solidus or shilling of account contained 12 denarii, silver "pennies," the ordinary silver coin of the period. Abbreviated s. In the sequence £ s. d. (libra, solidi, denarii), pounds, shillings, and pence.

Also I bequeath to the reparation of the stepnll of the said church of Saint Albane XX. solidos.

Paston Letters, III. 463.

2. A sign (/) used to denote the English shilling, representing the old lengthened form of s., as in 2/6, for 2s. 6d. This sign is often a convenient substitute for the horizontal line in fractions, as in

$\frac{1}{2000}, a/b, (a+b)/c, \text{ for } \frac{1}{2000} \frac{a}{b} \frac{a+b}{c}.$

Solidian (sol-i-dī'an), a. and n. [Formerly also solidian; < L. solus, alone, only, + fides, faith: see faith.] I. a. Holding the tenets of solidians; pertaining to the solidians.

A solidian Christian is a nullifidean Pagan, and confutes his tongue with his hand. Feltam, Resolves, II. 47.

II. n. One who maintains that faith alone, without works, is all that is necessary to justification. See fiduciarist, II., 2. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 325.

Solidianism (sol-i-dī'an-izm), n. [< solidian + -ism.] The doctrine that justification is of faith only, without works.

It was ordered that . . . for a year no preacher should preach either for or against purgatory, honouring of saints, marriage of priests, pilgrimages, miracles, or solidianism.

R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., IV.

Soliform (sol'i-fōrm), a. [< L. sol, the sun, + forma, form.] Formed like the sun. [Rare.]

For light, and sight and the seeing faculty, may both of them rightly be said to be soliform things, or of kin to the sun, but neither of them to be the sun itself.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 264.

Solifuge (sō-lif'ū-jē), n. pl. [NL. (Sundevall), fem. pl. of solifugus: see solifugus.] A sub-order or superfamily of tracheate Arachnida, having the cephalothorax segmented, the cheliceres chelate, and the palpi pediform. They are nocturnal, hiding by day, active, pugnacious, and predatory, and are reputed to be venomous; they chiefly inhabit warm countries. There are 15 genera, of which Dalmanes and Cleobis are found in the United States, and Galeodes is the most prominent. See Galeodidae, and compare the alternative Solpugida (with ent).

Solifugous (sō-lif'ū-gus), a. [< NL. solifugus, shunning sunlight (cf. ML. solifuga, an animal that shuns the light), < L. sol, sun, + fugere, flee, fly.] Shunning sunlight; fleeing from the light of day; nocturnal, as a member of the Solpugida.

Soliloquacious (sō-lil'ū-kwā'shūs), a. Soliloquizing; disposed to soliloquize. Moore, in Mason's Personal Traits of British Authors, II. 17.

Soliloquize (sō-lil'ū-kwāz), v.; pret. and pp. soliloquized, ppr. soliloquizing. [< F. soliloquiser = Sp. soliloquizar; as soliloquize + -ize.] To converse with oneself; to converse with one's self.

Soliloquy (sō-lil'ū-kwāz), n. [< F. soliloquie = Sp. soliloquio; as soliloquize + -y.] Conversation with oneself; conversation with one's self.

Soliloquy (sō-lil'ū-kwāz), n. [< F. soliloquie = Sp. soliloquio; as soliloquize + -y.] Conversation with oneself; conversation with one's self.

soliloquize (sō-lī'ō-kwīz), v. i.; pret. and pp. soliloquized, prp. soliloquizing. [< soliloquy + -ize.] To utter a soliloquy; talk to one's self. Also spelled soliloquise.

soliloquy (sō-lī'ō-kwī), n.; pl. soliloquies (-kwīz). [= F. soliloque = Sp. Pg. It. soliloquio, < LL. soliloquium, a talking to one's self, < solus, alone, + loqui, speak.] 1. A talking to one's self; a discourse or talk by a person who is alone, or which is not addressed to any one even when others are present.—2. A written composition containing such a talk or discourse, or what purports to be one.

Soliloquies; or, holy self-conferences of the devout soul, upon sundry choice occasions.

Bp. Hall, Soliloquies, Title.

The whole Poem is a Soliloquy. Prior, Solomon, Pref.

soliped (sol'i-ped), a. and n. [Also solipede; = F. solipède = Sp. solipedo = Pg. solipede, contr. < L. solidipes (-ped-), solid-hoofed, whole-hoofed, < solidus, solid, + pes (ped-) = E. foot.] Same as solidungulate.

solipedal (sol'i-ped-al), a. [< soliped + -al.] Same as solidungulate.

solipede (sol'i-pēd), n. Same as solidungulate. Sir T. Browne.

solipedous (sō-lip'e-dus), a. Same as solidungulate.

solipsism (sol'ip-sizm), n. [< L. solus, alone, + ipse, self, + -ism.] The belief or proposition that the person entertaining it alone exists, and that other people exist only as ideas in his mind. The identification of one's self with the Absolute is not generally intended, but the denial of there being really anybody else. The doctrine appears to be nothing more than a man of straw set up by metaphysicians in their reasonings.

solipsist (sol'ip-sist), n. [< L. solus, alone, + ipse, self, + -ist.] One who believes in his own existence only.

solipsistic (sol-ip-sis'tik), a. [< solipsist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to solipsism.

solisequious (sol-i-sē'kwi-us), a. [< L. solsequium, the sunflower; < L. sol, the sun, + sequi, follow: see sequent.] Following the course of the sun: as, the sunflower is a solisequious plant.

solist (sō'list), n. Same as soloist.

solitaire (sol-i-tair'), n. [F., < L. solitarius, alone, lonely: see solitary.] 1. A person who lives in solitude; a recluse; a hermit; a solitary.

Often have I been quietly going to take possession of that tranquillity and dulcitude I had so long found in the country, when one evening of your conversation has spoiled me for a solitaire too!

Pope, To Lady M. W. Montagu, Aug. 18, 1710.

2. A precious stone, oftenest a diamond, set by itself, and not combined with other jewels.—3. A loose necktie of black silk, resembling a ribbon, sometimes secured to the bag of the wig behind, and in front either falling loosely or secured by a brooch or similar jewel: a fashion for men in the eighteenth century.

He came in a solitaire, great sleeves, jessamine-powder, and a large bouquet of jonquils. Gray, Letters, I, 310.

4. A game which one person can play alone. In particular and properly—(a) A game played on a board indented with thirty-three or thirty-seven hemispherical hollows, with an equal number of balls. One ball is removed from the board, and the empty hollow thus left enables pieces to be captured. The object of the player is to take by jumping, as in checkers, all the pieces except one without moving diagonally or over more than one space at a time; or else, by similar moves, to leave certain configurations. (b) One of a great number of card-games, the usual object of which is to bring the shuffled and confused cards into regular order or sequence. This sort of game is more properly called patience.

5. In ornith.: (a) An extinct didine bird, Pezophaps solitarius. See Pezophaps. (b) A flycatching thrush of Jamaica, Myiadestes arundinatus, which leads a retired life in wooded mountainous resorts; hence, any bird of this genus. The name was originally applied to the bird of Martinique, now known as M. genibarbis. Townsend's solitaire is a common bird of many parts of the western United States. All are fine songsters. See Myiadestes. (c) The pensive thrush, Monticola or Petrocincla solitaria. See rock-thrush.

solitarian (sol-i-tair'-an), n. [< L. solitarius, alone, lonely, + -an.] A hermit; a solitary.

solitariety (sol'i-tair'-e-ti), n. [< L. solitarius, alone, lonely, + -ety.] Solitary condition or state; aloneness.

According to the Egyptians, before all entities and principles there is one God, who is in order of nature before (him that is commonly called) the first God and King, immovable, and always remaining in the solitariety of his own unity. Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 336.

solitarily (sol'i-tair-i-li), adv. In a solitary manner; without company; alone; by one's self; in solitude.

Feed thy people with thy rod, the flock of thine heritage, which dwell solitarily in the wood. Micah vii. 14.

solitariness (sol'i-tairi-ness), n. 1. The fact or state of being solitary, or alone, or without mate, partner, or companion, or of dwelling apart from others or by one's self; habitual retirement; solitude.

A man to eat alone is likewise great solitariness.

Guevara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 97.

2. The state or character of being retired or unfrequented; solitude; seclusion: as, the solitariness of a wood.

Birds . . . had found their way into the chapel, and built their nests among its friezes and pendants—sure signs of solitariness and desertion.

solitariousness (sol-i-tair-i-us-ness), n. Solitude; seclusion. Ascham, Toxophilus (ed. 1864), p. 41.

solitariness (sol-i-tair'-i-ness), n. [< solitary + -ity.] Solitude; loneliness.

I shall be abandoned at once to solitariness and penury.

W. Taylor, To Southey, Dec. 10, 1811.

solitary (sol'i-tair-i), a. and n. [< ME. solitarie, solitarie, < OF. solitarie, solitaire, F. solitaire = Pr. solitari, soletari = Sp. Pg. It. solitario, < L. solitarius, solitarius (LL. as n. an anchorite), for **solitarius*, < solita (-t)-s, loneliness, < solus, alone: see solace.] 1. a. 1. Living alone, or by one's self or by itself; without companions or associates; habitually inclined to avoid company.

Those rare and solitary, these in flocks.

Milton, P. L., vii. 461.

The solitary man is as speechless as the lower animals.

Whitney, Life and Growth of Language, p. 286.

2. All by one's self; without companions; unattended.

The Indian holds his course, silent, solitary, but undaunted, through the boundless bosom of the wilderness.

Ireing, Sketch-Book, p. 351.

3. Marked by solitude; especially, remote from society; unfrequented; retired; secluded; lonely: as, a solitary glen.

Whiche both lyen in the abbey of saynt Justyne vyrgyn, a place of Blake Monkes, ryght dolectable, and also solitary.

Sir R. Guylforde, Pilgrimage, p. 6.

Cor. And how like you this shepherd's life, Master Touchstone?

Touch. . . . In respect that it is solitary, I like it very well.

Shak., As you like it, iii. 2. 16.

4. Free from the sounds of human life; still; dismal.

Let that night be solitary, let no joyful voice come therein.

Job iii. 7.

5. Having a sense of loneliness; lonesome.

I am not solitary whilst I read and write, though nobody is with me.

Emerson, Nature, I.

6. Retiring; diffident.

Your honour doth say that you doo iudge me to be a man solitarie and vertuous.

Guevara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 78.

7. Passed without company; shared by no companions; lonely.

I was upon Point of going abroad to steal a solitary Walk, when yours of the 12th current came to hand.

Howell, Letters, ii. 60.

Ifm fair Lavinia, thy surviving wife,
Shall breed in groves, to lead a solitary life.

Dryden, Æneid, vi. 1038.

8. Single; sole; only, or only one: as, a solitary instance; a solitary example.

A solitary shrike, the bubbling cry
Of some strong swimmer in his nagon.

Byron, Don Juan, ii. 53.

Polliteness was his [Charles II.'s] solitary good quality.

Macaulay, Dryden.

9. In bot., one only in a place; separate: as, a solitary stipule. A flower is said to be solitary when there is only one on each peduncle, or only one to each plant; a seed, when there is only one in a pericarp.

All the New Zealand species [Pterostylis trullifolia] bear solitary flowers, so that distinct plants cannot fail to be intercrossed. Darwin, Fertil. of Orchids by Insects, p. 89.

10. In anat., single; separate; not clustered; not agglutinate or gathered into patches; simple; not compound: as, the solitary follicles of the intestine.—11. In zool.: (a) Not social, sociable, or gregarious: noting species living habitually alone, or in pairs only. (b) Simple; not compound, aggregate, or colonial: as, solitary ascidians. See Simplicies.—Solitary ants, the Monilidae or spider-ants.—Solitary bees, bees that do not live in a hive or community like the honey-bee, and are represented only by developed males and females, like most insects. There are very many species, of numerous genera. The designation is chiefly descriptive, not classificatory, but sometimes denotes the Andrenidae as distinguished from the Apidae.—Solitary bundle. Same as solitary juncture.—Solitary confinement, in a general sense, the separate confinement of a prisoner, with only occasional access of any other person, and that only at the discretion of the jailer; in a stricter sense, the complete isolation of a prisoner from all human society, and his confinement in a cell so arranged that he has no direct intercourse with, or sight of, any human being, and no employment or instruction. Miller, J., in re Medley, 134 U. S., 160.—Solitary follicle. See solitary gland, under gland.—Solitary funiculus, a round bundle of fibers laterad of the combined small-celled nucleus of the glossopharyngeus, vagus, and spinal accessory, which passes out as one of the roots of the glossopharyngeus, but may contribute to the vagus and accessory. Also called ascending root of glossopharyngeus, fasciculus rotundus, ascending root of the lateral mixed system, fasciculus solitarius, respiratory bundle, and fascicle of Krause.—Solitary glands. See gland.—Solitary greenlet or vireo, Vireo solitarius, the blue-headed greenlet or vireo of the United States, having greenish upper parts, a bluish

solitude (sol'i-tūd), n. [< ME. solitudo, < OF. (and F.) solitudo = It. solitudine, < L. solitudo, loneliness, < solus, alone: see solace.] 1. The state of being alone; a lonely life; loneliness.

Little do men perceive what solitude is, and how far it extendeth; for a crowd is not company. . . . It is a mere and miserable solitude to want true friends.

Bacon, Friendship.

O, might I here

Obscured!

Milton, P. L., iv. 1035.

2. Remoteness from society; lack or utter want of companionship: applied to place: as, the solitude of a wood or a valley.

The solitude of his little parish is become matter of great comfort to him.

Lane.

3. A lonely, secluded, or unfrequented place; a desert.

We walked about 2 miles from y<sup>e</sup> city to an agreeable solitude called Du Plessis, a house belonging to y<sup>e</sup> King.

Evelyn, Diary, June 7, 1644.

There is such an agreeable variety of fields, wood, water, and cascades that it is one of the most delightful solitudes I ever saw.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. 1. 224.

=Syn. 1. Solitude, Retirement, Seclusion, Loneliness, Lonesomeness. Solitude is the condition of being absolutely alone, whether or not one has been with others, or desires to escape from them: as, the solitude of the Sphinx. Retirement is comparative solitude, produced by retiring, voluntarily or otherwise, from contact which one has had with others. Seclusion is stronger than retirement, implying the shutting out of others from access: after the Restoration Milton for safety's sake kept himself in retirement; indeed, except to a few trusted friends, he was in complete seclusion. Loneliness expresses the uncomfortable feelings, the longing for society, of one who is alone. Lonesomeness may be a lighter kind of loneliness, especially a feeling less spiritual than physical, growing out of the animal instinct for society and the desire of protection, the consciousness of being alone: as, the lonesomeness of a walk through a cemetery at night. Lonesomeness, more often than loneliness, may express the impression made upon the observer.

solivagant (sō-liv'ā-gant), a. [L. solus, alone, + vagant (-s), ppr. of vagari, wander, roam: see vagant.] Same as solivagous. [Rare.]

solve (sō-lēv'), n. [OF. solive, solieve, F. solve (ML. reflex soliva, solivia), a girder, joist; origin uncertain; perhaps ult. < L. sublevare, lift up from beneath, support: see sollevare, sullevate, sublevate.] A joist, rafter, or secondary beam of wood, either split or sawed, used in laying ceilings or floors, and for resting upon the main beams.

sollar, soller (sō-lār, -ēr), n. [Also solar; < ME. sollar, soller, soler, < OF. soler, solair, soller, a floor, loft, granary, cellar, F. dial. solier, a granary, = Pr. solar, soller = It. solare, solajo = AS. solere, soler = OS. soleri = MD. solder, D. solder = MLG. solder, soller = OHG. soleri, solāri, the pretorium, a guest-chamber, MHG. solre, solare, G. sōller, a balcony, an upper room, garret, < L. solarium, a sunny place, a terrace, the flat roof of a house exposed to the sun, a sun-dial, < sol, the sun: see sol, solarium. Perhaps in some senses confused with L. solum, ground: see soil.] 1. Originally, an open gallery or balcony at the top of a house, exposed to the sun; later, any upper room, loft, or garret.

Thou shalt make soleris and pineis of three chaumbris in the schip. Wyclif, Gen. vi. 16.

2. An elevated chamber in a church from which to watch the lamps burning before the altars. Encyc. Brit., II. 473.—3. A story of a house. See the quotation.

Maison à trois estages. An house of three sollers, floors, stories, or lofts one over another. Nomenclator. (Nares.)

4. In mining, a platform or resting-place. See ladder-sollar and air-sollar.

solleret (sō-lēr-et), n. [Also soleret; < F. soleret, dim. of OF. soler, a slipper, < sole, sole: see sole.] The steel shoe forming a part of armor in the fourteenth century and later, usually having splints overlapping one another and a long point or toe curved downward. It was worn only when the foot was in the stirrup, and could be removed when the rider dismounted. See also cuts under armor and poulaine.—Bear-paw solleret, the steel foot-covering worn during the second half of the fifteenth century, resembling remotely the broad foot of the bear. Compare sabbaton.

sollit, sollitication, etc. See solicit, etc.

sol-lunar (sō-lū'nār), a. [L. sol, the sun, + lunar, the moon: see lunar.] Proceeding from or due to the influence of both the sun and the moon: in old medicine applied to the influence supposed to be produced on various diseases when the sun and moon are in conjunction.

solmizate (sō-mī-zāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. solmizated, ppr. solmizing. [< F. solmiser (as sol + mi, notes of the gamut (cf. sol-fa), + -iser = E. -ize), + -ate.] In music, to use solmization syllables. Also spelled solmisate.

solmization (sō-mī-zā'shon), n. [< F. solmisation; as solmizate + -ion. Cf. ML. solmificatio (-n-).] In music, the act, process, or result of using certain syllables to name or represent the tones of the scale, or of a particular series, as the scale of C. The oldest and most important system of solmization is that attributed to Guido d'Arczzo, early in the eleventh century; though this in turn appears to have been suggested by a similar usage among the ancient Greeks. (See gamut.) The series ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la (derived from the initial syllables of the lines of a hymn to St. John, beginning "Ut queant laxis") was applied to the tones of each of the hexachords then recognized. (See hexachord.) When a melody exceeded the limits of a single hexachord, a change from one series of syllables to another was made, which was called a mutation or modulation. Early in the sixteenth century, when the modern octave scale became established, the syllable si (probably taken from the initials of the last line of the above hymn) was added for the seventh or leading tone. Somewhat later do was substituted in Italy and Germany for ut, on account of its greater sonority. The series thus formed is still in use, though other systems have been proposed. Such other systems are boedization (bo, ce, di, ga, lo, na, ni), also called boization; bebization (ba, be, ce, de, me, fe, ge); and damenization (da, me, ni, zo, tu, la, be). In England and America, from before the middle of the seventeenth century to the beginning of the nineteenth, an abbreviated system was used, including only mi, fa, sol, la. The ideal application of solmization involves calling whatever tone is taken as the key-note do, irrespective of its pitch, and adjusting the other syllables accordingly, so that the scale-tones shall always be named by the same syllables respectively, and the various intervals by the same combination of syllables. This system is often called that of the movable do, since the pitch of do is variable. What is called the fixed-do system has also had considerable currency in Italy, France, and England, according to which the tone C is always called do, D re, E mi, etc., and this too when the pitch of these tones is chromatically altered, the system therefore following the arbitrary features of the keyboard and the staff notation. This system is regarded by many musicians as contrary to the historic and logical idea of solmization, and its use in England and America is decreasing. The most important special application of solmization in musical study is that of the tonic sol-fa system (which see, under tonic), the syllables of which are doh, ray, me, fah, soh, lah, te. In the movable-do system the sharp of any tone is indicated by a syllable beginning with the same consonant as that of the tone, and using the vowel i: as, di for do, fi for fa, etc.; and similarly the flat of any tone is indicated by a syllable using the vowel e: as, me for mi, le for la, etc. The minor scale is solmized in two ways: either beginning with la, and using the same syllables as in the major scale; or beginning with do, and using such modified syllables as may be needed (do, re, me, etc.). The great utility of solmization lies in its offering an abstract vocal notation of musical facts, whereby they may be named, remembered, and studied. Also solmisation, solmization, solfeggio, and sol-faing.

sol (sō), a. and n. [< It. solo, alone, < L. solus, solo: see solus.] 1. In music, alone; not combined with other voices or instruments of equal importance; not concerted. A solo passage may be accompanied, however, by voices or instruments of less importance.—Solo organ, in organ-building, a partial organ introduced into large instruments, containing stops of special power or effectiveness, such as are used in producing striking solo effects. Its keyboard is usually the upper one when there are four, or the lower when there are three. Its stops are often connected with special bellows, which is weighted with extra weights; they are then said to be "on a heavy wind." The choir-organ is also sometimes loosely called the solo organ. See organ.—Solo pitch, in music, a special pitch or accordatura (scordatura) adopted by a solo performer upon a violin or other solo instrument, so as to produce peculiar and startling effects.—Solo stop, in organ-building, a stop either of special quality or placed on a heavy wind, so as to be fitted for the performance of solos. Such stops often occur in each of the usual partial organs, but in large instruments the most important of them are gathered into a separate partial organ called the solo organ (see above).

II. n.; It. pl. soli (-li), E. pl. solos (-lōz). 1. A melody, movement, or work intended for or performed by a single performer, vocal or instrumental, with or without accompaniment. Opposed to concerted piece, whether chorus, duet, trio, or for a number of instruments.—2. A game of cards, played usually by four persons, with a euchre pack. That player who bids highest—that is, offers to take the greatest number of tricks alone, or, in a variety of the game, aided by a partner—plays against the rest. If he takes five or more tricks, he receives a payment from them; if not, he makes a payment to them.

solograph (sō-lō-grāf), n. [< L. sol, the sun, + Gr. γράφω, write.] A picture on paper taken by the talbotype or eolotype process. Simmonds.

soloist (sō-lō-ist), n. [< solo + -ist.] In music, a performer of solos, vocal or instrumental. Also solist.

Solomonic (sō-lō-mon'ik), a. [< Solomon (see def.) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to Solomon, son of David and his successor as king of Israel: as, Solomonic wisdom.

Solomon's hyssop, Porch, servants. See hyssop, porch, servant.

Solomon's seal (sō-lō-monz-sē'), n. 1. A plant of the genus Polygonatum. The common Solomon's seal in England is P. multiflorum, a plant with erect or curving stems 2 feet high, and flowers from one to eight in a cluster.

A smaller Old World species is P. officinale, whose root (like that of P. multiflorum) is emetic, cathartic, etc., and was formerly much applied to bruises. In America P. grandifolium is the great Solomon's seal, a species 2 to 7 feet high, with leaves 3 to 8 inches long, and two to eight flowers in a cluster; and P. biflorum is the smaller Solomon's seal, growing 1 to 3 feet high, with the peduncles commonly two-flowered. The larger species are rather striking plants; P. multiflorum has been much cultivated. See also cut under rhizome.

2. A symbol formed of two triangles interlaced or superposed, presenting a six-rayed figure,  Compare pentacle.—False Solomon's seal. (a) See Smilacina. (b) See Malanthemum.

so-long (sō-lōng'), interj. [Prob. a sailors' perversion of salaam.] Good-by. Also so long. [Slang.]

Solonian (sō-lō-ni-an), a. [< L. Solon, < Gr. Σόλων, Solon, + -ian.] Of or pertaining to Solon, a famous lawgiver of Athens (about 594 B. C.): as, the Solonian Constitutions; Solonian legislation.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 193.

As to the interpretation of the Scriptures solute and at large, there have been divers kinds introduced and devised, some of them rather curious and unsafe than sober and warranted. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

2. Relaxed; hence, joyous; merry.
Bacchus, purple god of joyous wit,
A brow solute, and ever laughing eye.
Young, Night Thoughts, ii. 579.

3. In bot., free; not adhering: opposed to adnate: as, a solute stipule.—4. Soluble: as, a solute salt.

solute (sô-lüt'), v. t. [L. solutus, pp. of solvere, loosen, solve: see solve, solute, a.] To dissolve; also, to resolve; answer; absolve.

What wilt not boldness bid a man say, when he hath made an argument against himself which he cannot solute?

Ep. Ridley, in Bradford's Works (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 393.
solution (sô-lü'shon), n. [ME. solucion, < OF. solucion, solution, fr. solution = Fr. solution = Sp. solucion = Pg. solução = It. soluzione, < L. solu- tio(n)-, a loosing, dissolving, < solvere, pp. solutus, loose, resolve, dissolve: see solve.] 1. The act of separating the parts of any body; disruption; rupture; fracture; breach: as, a solution of continuity (see below).—2. The transformation of matter from a solid or gaseous state to the liquid state by means of a liquid called the solvent or menstruum; the state of being dissolved. The nature of the phenomenon depends upon whether chemical action is or is not present. Solution in the physical sense—the common and proper use of the word—is illustrated by dissolving sugar or salt in water, or silver in mercury; here, and in similar cases, when by the removal of the liquid (as by evaporation) the original solid is obtained, the process is essentially a change of molecular state, from the solid to the liquid, and hence accompanied by the absorption of heat; this is strikingly seen in freezing-mixtures. The word is not infrequently used, however, when the phenomenon is one of chemical combination only, as when silver dissolves in nitric acid, forming a new substance, silver nitrate; this, as is generally true of chemical union, is accompanied by the evolution of heat. The two phenomena, physical and chemical, may both be present in solution at the same time, and the line between them often cannot be sharply drawn; glacial acetic acid dissolves in water and at the same time combines with it, the liberation of heat of the chemical part of the process overbalancing the absorption of heat in the physical. The solution of a gas in a liquid, as of ammonia gas in water (also called absorption), is essentially the physical process of the change of the gas to the liquid, and hence is accompanied with the evolution of heat. The term solution is also sometimes applied to the absorption of gases by solids, as when palladium absorbs or dissolves hydrogen gas, forming a true alloy with it. The solubility of any solid is constant at a given temperature, and may be accurately determined by experiment. It may be increased or diminished by the presence of other substances in solution. The solubility of any gas also is constant under the same conditions. It varies with the temperature, the pressure, the nature of the liquid, and the matters in solution in it. In a mixture of gases, each is dissolved in the same quantity as if it were present alone under the same tension as in the mixture.

3. The liquid produced as a result of the process or action above described; the preparation made by dissolving a solid in a liquid: as, a solution of salt, soda, or alum; solution of iron, etc.—4. A liquid or dissolved state or condition; unsettled state; suspense.

Uls (Lessing's) was a mind always in solution, which the divine order of things, as it is called, could not precipitate into any of the traditional forms of crystallization, and in which the time to come was already fermenting.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 313.

5. The act of solving, working out, explaining, clearing up, or settling, or the state of being solved, explained, cleared up, or settled; resolution; explanation: as, the solution of a difficult problem or of a doubt in easuistry.

It is accordance to nature no man to do that wherby he shoulde take . . . a praye of a nother mannes ignorance. Of this matter Tullius writeth many prope examples and quicke solutions. Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, iii. 4.

In his singular "Ode inscribed to W. H. Channing" there is a hint of a possible solution of the slavery problem.

O. W. Holmes, Emerson, viii.
6. A method of solving or finally clearing up or settling something. Specifically—7. The answer to a problem or puzzle of any kind, together with the proof that that answer is correct.—8. Dissolution; a dissolving.

Easy and frequent, solutions of conjugal society. Locke, Civil Government, § 80.

9. Release; deliverance; discharge. Imp. Diet.

—10. In med., the termination of a disease, especially when accompanied by critical symptoms; the crisis of a disease.—11. In civil law, payment; satisfaction of a creditor.—Alcoholic solution. See tincture.—Algebraic solution of an equation, a solution by means of no algebraic formula, especially by radicals.—Aqueous solution, a solution whose solvent or menstruum is water.—Barreswill's solution, a test for sugar similar to Fehling's solution.—Burnett's solution. See Burnett's liquid, under liquid.—Burrow's solution, a solution of aluminum subacetate, used as a local astringent in skin-affections.—Cardan's solution, the ordinary algebraic solution of a cubic. See cubic.—Cayley's solution. (a) A solution of the general cubic. Let  $U = 0$  be the cubic,  $D$  its discriminant, and  $J$  its cubicovariant, then the solution follows from

$$\sqrt{U} \sqrt{D} + J + \sqrt{U} \sqrt{D} - J.$$

These cube roots can always be extracted. (b) A solution of the general quartic, due to Professor Cayley. Let  $U = 0$  be the quartic,  $H$  its Hessian,  $S$  its quadrivariant,  $T$  its cubivariant or catalecticant, and  $c_1, c_2, c_3$  the roots of the cubic  $c^3 - Sc + T = 0$ , then the solution follows from

$$(c_2 - c_3) \sqrt{H - c_1 U} + (c_3 - c_1) \sqrt{H - c_2 U} + (c_1 - c_2) \sqrt{H - c_3 U} = 0.$$

The square roots can always be extracted.—Chemical solution, the solution of a solid body in a liquid which is caused by or accompanied with a chemical reaction between the solid and the solution, as of zinc in dilute sulphuric acid.—Clemens's solution, a solution of arsenic bromide, used in the treatment of diabetes.—Compound solution of iodine. Same as Lugol's solution.—Compound solution of sodium borate. Same as Do-bell's solution.—Descartes's solution, an algebraical solution of the general biquadratic equation, differing from Ferrari's only in the method of investigation.—Do-bell's solution, a solution containing sodium borate 120 grains, sodium bicarbonate 120 grains, crystallized carbonic acid 24 grains, glycerin 1 fluidounce, water to make 16 fluidounces.—Donovan's solution, a solution of arsenic iodide 1, red iodide of mercury 1, water 98 parts: alternative.—Ethereal solution of iodide of arsenic and mercury.—Ethereal solution of iodide of arsenic, a solution whose solvent or menstruum is an ether, usually sulphuric ether.—Euler's solution, a solution of a biquadratic after the second term has been got rid of. It differs little from Ferrari's solution.—Fehling's solution, an aqueous solution of copper sulphate, Rochelle salts, and sodium hydrate. When heated with any reducing sugar, as dextrose, copper suboxide is deposited from it. It is used in the analysis of saccharine bodies, and as a qualitative test of the presence of sugar.—Ferrari's solution, a solution of the general biquadratic. See biquadratic equation, under equation.—Fowler's solution, a solution of arsenious acid 1, potassium bicarbonate 1, compound tincture of lavender 3, water 95 parts: one of the best vehicles for administering arsenic. Also called liquor potassii arsenitici, solution of arsenite of potassium, and ague-drop.—General solution. See differential equation, under equation.—Goadby's solution, a preparation for preserving animal substances, made with bay-salt, corrosive sublimate or arsenious acid, and water. Thomas, Med. Diet.—Hall's solution of strychnine, a solution of strychnine acetate 10 grains, dilute acetic acid 1 fluidounce, alcohol 4 fluidounces, compound tincture of cardamom 60 minims, water to make 16 fluidounces.—Heavy solution, in mineral, a liquid of high density, as a solution of mercuric iodide in potassium iodide (called the Sonstadt or Thoutlet solution), having a maximum specific gravity of 3.2, or of borotungstate of cadmium (Klein solution), specific gravity 3.6, used as a gravity-solution (which see).—Improper solution, a function which solves a given differential equation, but also solves an equation either of lower order or of the same order but of lower degree.—Javelle's solution, potassium carbonate 58, chlorinated lime 80, water 862 parts. Also called solution of chlorinated potassa.—Labarraque's solution. Same as Labarraque's fluid (which see, under fluid).—Löffler's solution, a saturated alcoholic solution of methyl blue 30 parts, and 100 parts of a 1:10,000 aqueous solution of potassium hydrate: used in staining bacteria.—Lugol's solution, a solution of iodine 5, potassium iodide 10, water 85 parts. Also called compound solution of iodine.—Magendie's solution of morphine, morphine sulphate 10 grains, water 1 fluidounce: used to administer morphine hypodermically.—Mechanical solution, the mere union of a solid with a liquid in such a manner that its aggregate form is changed without any alteration of the chemical properties of either the solid or its solvent: thus, sugar dissolves in water without either undergoing any chemical change.—Mechanical solution of a problem. See mechanical.—Mineral solution. See mineral.—Nessler's solution. Same as Nessler's reagent (which see, under reagent).—Numerical solution, a solution of an equation by means of numerical approximation.—Particular solution. See differential equation, under equation.—Pasteur's solution, in bot., a liquid holding in solution a small percentage of certain inorganic salts and a larger percentage of certain organic substances, employed in the cultivation of the lower forms of vegetable life, such as bacteria, yeast-cells, and fungi, for purposes of study. The composition is—potassium phosphate 20 parts, calcium phosphate 2 parts, magnesium sulphate 2 parts, ammonium tartrate 100 parts, cane-sugar 1,500 parts, distilled water 5,376 parts.—Pearson's arsenical solution, crystallized sodium arseniate 1, water 690 parts.—Pierlot's solution, an aqueous solution of ammonium valerianate to which is added some of the alcoholic extract of valerian.—Proper solution, a function which satisfies a differential equation, and no equation of lower order nor of the same order but of lower degree.—Saturated solution, a solution which at the given temperature cannot be made to contain more of the given substance than it already contains, the adhesion of the liquid to the substance being just balanced by the cohesion of the particles of the solid body in contact with it.—Simpson's solution. Same as Ferrari's solution.—Singular solution. See differential equation, under equation.—Solution of acetate of ammonia, in phar., a solution composed of dilute acetic acid 100 parts, ammonium carbonate added to the point of neutralization: a valuable diaphoretic and diuretic. Also called spirit of Mindererus.—Solution of albumen, a test solution consisting of the white of one egg triturated with four ounces of water, and filtered: used in pharmaceutical work.—Solution of an equation. See equation.—Solution of continuity, in surv., the separation of parts normally continuous, as by a fracture, laceration, etc.—Solution of lime, a clean saturated solution of slaked lime in water, useful as an antacid, astringent, and tonic. Commonly called lime-water.—Solution of potassa, in phar., an aqueous solution of potassium hydrate, KHO, containing 5 per cent. of the hydrate: an antacid, diuretic, and antilithic. Also called liquor potassæ.—Solution of soda, in phar., an aqueous solution containing 5 per cent. of sodium hydrate.—Solution of sodium carbonate, in phar., crystals of carbonic acid 30, sodium hydrate 2, water 28 parts. Also called phenol solution.—Solution of subacetate of lead, a solution composed of lead acetate 170, lead oxide 120, water 1,710 parts: a useful astringent and sedative for external use. Also called Goulard's extract.—Sonstadt solution, a solution of mercuric iodide in potassium iodide. See specific gravity, under gravity.—Standardized solution, a solution whose strength or composition has been accurately determined, and which is used as a standard of comparison.—Thompson's solution of phosphorus, a solution containing phosphorus, absolute alcohol, spirit of pepper-mint, and glycerin.—Trigonometrical solution, a solution of an equation by means of trigonometric functions. For an example, see cubic equation, under equation.—Van Swieten's solution, a solution of mercury perchlorid.—Vlemingck's solution, a solution composed of lime 1, sulphur 2, water 20 parts boiled down to 12 parts.

solutive (sol-ü-tiv), a. [solute + -ive.] 1. Tending to dissolve; loosening; laxative.

Abstersive, and opening, and soluteive as mead.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 848.

2. Capable of being dissolved or loosened. Imp. Diet.

solvability (sol-vā-bil'i-ti), n. [< solvable + -ity (see -bility).] 1. Capability of being solved; solubility: as, the solvability of an equation.—2. Ability to pay all just debts; solvency.

solvable (sol-vā-bl), a. [< F. solvable, payable; as solve + -able.] 1. Payable.

Some of those corrodies (where the property was altered into a set summe of money) was solvable out of the exchequer. Fuller, Ch. Hist., VI. 326. (Davies.)

2. Solvent.

Was this well done of him [David, at Adullam], to be protector-general of outlaws, thereby defying justice, defrauding creditors, defeating God's command, which provided that the debtor, if not solvable, should be sold for satisfaction? Fuller, Pisgah Sight, II. xiii. 32.

3. Capable of being solved, resolved, or explained: as, equations above the fourth degree are not solvable by means of radicals.

Also soluble.

solvableness (sol-vā-bl-nes), n. Solvability.

Solvay process. See soda, 1.

solve (solv), v. t.; pret. and pp. solved, ppr. solving. [< ME. solven, < OF. solver, vernacularly soudre, F. soudre = Sp. Pg. solver = It. solvere, < L. solvere, pp. solutus, loosen, relax, solvo, < so-, for se-, apart (see se-, and cf. sober), + luere, loosen, = Gr. λύνω, loosen, set free, release: see lose, loose. Hence ult. (< L. solvere) E. solvable, solvent, soluble, solute, solution, etc., absolute, absolute, assol, dissolve, dissolve, resolve, resolute, etc.] 1. To loosen; disentangle; unravel; hence, to explain or clear up the difficulties in; resolve; explain; make clear; remove perplexity from: as, to solve a difficulty, a puzzle, or a problem.

If her wretched captives could not solve and interpret these riddles, she with great cruelty fell upon them in their hesitation and confusion, and tore them to pieces. Bacon, Physical Fabrics, x.

The most subtle and powerful intellects have been labouring for centuries to solve these difficulties. Macaulay, Sadler's Law of Population.

2. To determine; put an end to; settle.

He . . . would . . . solve high dispute With conjugal carcasses. Milton, P. L., viii. 50.

Centuries elapsed before the attempt to solve the great schism of the East and West by a Council. Pusey, Eirenicon, p. 91.

3. To determine or work out by rule; operate on by calculation or mathematical processes, so as to bring out the required result: as, to solve a problem in mathematics.—4. To dissolve; melt. [Rare.]

Under the influence of the acid, which partly destroys, partly solves the membranes. Workshop Receipts, 1st ser., p. 351.

solvet (solv), n. [< solve, v.] Solution.

But why thy odour matcheth not thy show, The solvet is this, that thou dost common grow. Shak., Sonnets, lxx.

solvency (sol'ven-si), n. [< solven(t) + -cy.] The state of being solvent; ability to pay all just debts or just claims.

Our speech . . . was of tithes and creeds, of beeves and grain, of commodities wet and dry, and the solvency of the retail dealers. Scott, Rob Roy, iii.

solvend (sol'vend), n. [< L. solvendum, fut. pass. part. of solvere, loosen, dissolve: see solve.] A substance to be dissolved.

Solutions differ from chemical compounds in retaining the properties both of the solvent and of the solvend. C. Tomlinson.

solvent (sol'vent), a. and n. [= Sp. It. solvente, < L. solven(t)-s, ppr. of solvere, loosen, dissolve: see solve.] 1. a. 1. Having the power of dissolving: as, a solvent body.—2. Able or sufficient to pay all just debts: as, a solvent person or estate. Specifically—(a) Able to pay one's debts as they become due in the ordinary course of business. (b) Having property in such amount and situation that all one's debts can be collected out of it by legal process. See insolvency. (c) Of sufficient value to pay all just debts: as, the estate is solvent.

II. n. Any fluid or substance that dissolves or renders other bodies liquid; a menstruum. Water is of all solvents the most common and most useful. Alcohol is the solvent of resinous bodies and of some other similarly constituted substances; naphtha, oil of turpentine, and ether are solvents of caoutchouc; chlorin and aqua regia, or nitromuriatic acid, are solvents of gold.

The universal solvent sought by the alchemists. Lovell, Study Windows, p. 315.

solver (sol'ver), n. [< solve + -er.] One who solves, in any sense of the verb.

solvable (sol'vi-bl), a. See solvable.

soma<sup>1</sup> (sō'mā), n.; pl. somata (-mā-tā). [NL., < Gr. σῶμα, the body, a dead body, body as opposed to spirit, material substance, mass, etc., also a person, body, human being.] Body. Specifically—(a) In anat. and zool., the entire axial part of the body of an animal; the corpus, minus the membra; the head, neck, trunk, and tail, without the limbs. (b) In theol., the body as distinguished from the psychic or soul and the pneuma or spirit.

soma<sup>2</sup> (sō'mā), n. [< Skt. soma (= Zond haoma), juice, < √ su, press out. Cf. Gr. σῶς, juice, sap (see opium), L. sucus, succus, juice (see succulent).] 1. In ancient India, a drink having intoxicating properties, expressed from the stems of a certain plant, and playing an important part in sacrifices, being offered especially to the god Indra. It was personified and deified, and worshiped as a god.—2. An East Indian plant, the probable source of the beverage soma. It is believed to be of the milkweed family and of the species now classed as Sarcostemma brevistigma (the Asclepias acida of Roxburgh). This is a twining plant, with jointed woody stems of the size of a quill, and numerous succulent branches which are pendulous when unsupported. The flowers are small, greenish-white, and fragrant, in elegant small umbel-like cymes at the ends of the branchlets. The plant yields a mild acidulous milky juice, which appears to have formed the basis of the drink called soma (see def. 1). The juice of more than one species may have been thus used. The plant grows in dry rocky places in India and Burma. Also called moon-plant (from mythological associations) and swallowwort.

3. In later Hind. myth., the moon, or [cap.] the doity of the moon.

somacule (sō'mā-kūl), n. [*< NL. *somaculum*, dim. of soma, < Gr. σῶμα, body: see soma<sup>1</sup>.] The smallest portion of protoplasm which can retain its physiological properties—that is, the chemical molecule of protoplasm. Foster.

Somaj (sō-māj'), n. [< Hind. somāj, a church, an assembly, < Skt. samāja, assembly, < sam, together, + √ aj, drive. Cf. Brahmo-Somaj.] See Brahmo-Somaj.

soma-plant (sō'mā-plant), n. Same as soma, 2.

Somaschian (sō-mas'ki-an), n. [< Somascha (see def.) + -ian.] A member of a Roman Catholic congregation, founded at Somascha, near Milan, in Italy, in the first half of the sixteenth century: it adopted the rules of St. Augustine.

Somataria (sō-mā-tē-ri-ā), n. [NL. (Leach, 1819), so called in allusion to the down on the body; < Gr. σῶμα(-r-), body, + τῆρον, wool.] A genus of Anatidae of the subfamily Fuligininae, including various marine ducks of large size, with copious down on the under parts, with which the female lines the nest, and large, diversiform, variously feathered or gibbous bill; the oiders or oider-ducks. The common oider is S. mollissima; the king-duck is S. spectabilis; the spectacled oider is S. fischeri; Steller's oider is S. stelleri. The genus is often dismembered into Somataria proper, Erionetta, Lampronetta, and Heniconetta (or Polysticta), respectively represented by the four species named. They inhabit arctic and northern regions, and are related to the scoters (Edemia). See Polysticta, and cut under oider-duck.

somatic (sō-mat'ik), a. [= F. somatique, < Gr. σωματικός, pertaining to the body, bodily, < σῶμα, the body: see soma<sup>1</sup>.] 1. Of or pertaining to the body or material organism, as distinguished from the soul, spirit, or mind; physical; corporeal; bodily.

It was shown that in the British official nosology mental diseases were classified as disorders of the intellect, the idea of somatic disease as associated with insanity being studiously ignored. Dr. Tuke.

We need here to call to mind the continuity of our presentations, and especially the existence of a background of organic sensations or somatic consciousness, as it is variously termed. J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 68.

2. Of or pertaining to the soma: as, the longitudinal somatic axis lies in the meso.—3. Of or pertaining to the cavity or interior hollow of the body of an animal, and especially to the body-walls of such cavity; parietal, as distinguished from visceral or splanchnic; cœlomatic; somatopleural.—4. Pertaining to mass.—somatic anthropology, that division of anthropology which deals with anatomical points.—Somatic cavity, the cœlomatic cavity, body-cavity, or cœlom: distinguished from enteric cavity, from which it is usually shut off completely. The interiors of the thorax and abdomen are somatic cavities. See cuts under Actinozoa, Campanularia, and Hydrozoa.

In the Cœlenterata, the somatic cavity, or enterocœle, is in free communication with the digestive cavity. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 56.

Somatic cells, in bot., cells forming a part of the body of the individual, not specifically modified for any other purpose: said sometimes of those cells of plants which take part in vegetative reproduction.—Somatic death, death of the body as a whole: contrasted with death of any of its parts.—Somatic musculature, the muscles of the somatopleuric; that one of the two chief layers of muscles which is subjacent to the dermic or outer epithelium: contrasted with splanchnic musculature.—Somatic velocity, the mass of matter through which a disturbance is propagated in a unit of time while advancing along a prism of unit sectional area; mass-velocity. Rankine.

somatal (sō-mat'i-kal), a. [< somatic + -al.] Same as somatic. Bailey, 1727.

somatics (sō-mat'iks), n. [Pl. of somatic (see -ics).] Same as somatology, 1.

somatism (sō'ma-tizm), n. [< Gr. σῶμα(-r-), the body, + -ism.] Materialism.

somatist (sō'ma-tist), n. [< Gr. σῶμα(-r-), the body, + -ist.] One who admits the existence of corporeal or material beings only; one who denies the existence of spiritual substances; a materialist.

And so our unnatural somatists know none of the most excellent substances, which actuate all the rest, but only the more base and gross, which are actuated by them. Baxter, Dying Thoughts.

somato-ætiological (sō'ma-tō-ē'ti-ō-lōj'i-kal), a. [< Gr. σῶμα(-r-), body, + Ætiology + -ic-al.] Pertaining to or regarding the body as a cause (as of disease). E. C. Mann, Psychol. Med., p. 51.

somatocyst (sō'ma-tō-sist), n. [< Gr. σῶμα(-r-), the body, + κύστις, bladder: see cyst.] The inflated stem or body of some siphonophorans, or oceanic hydrozoans, serving as a pneumatocyst or air-sac to float or buoy these organisms, as in the case of the Portuguese man-of-war. See Calyptophora, Siphonophora, and cuts under Diphyidæ and Physalia.

somatocystic (sō'ma-tō-sis'tik), a. [< somatocyst + -ic.] Vesicular or cystic, as the body-cavity of a siphonophorous hydrozoan; or of or pertaining to a somatocyst.

somatogenic (sō'ma-tō-jen'ik), a. [< Gr. σῶμα(-r-), the body, + -γενής, produced: see -genesis.] Originating in the soma, body, or physical organism in consequence of its conditions of environment: noting those modifications or biological characters which an organism acquires in reacting upon its material surroundings.

He [Prof. Weismann] uses the term somatogenic to express those characters which first appear in the body itself, and which follow from the reaction of the soma under direct external influences. Nature, XL. 531.

somatologic (sō'ma-tō-lōj'ik), a. [< somatolog-y + -ic.] Same as somatological.

somatological (sō'ma-tō-lōj'i-kal), a. [< somatolog-y + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to somatology in any sense, especially to somatology as a department of anthropology; physical; corporeal; material.

somatologically (sō'ma-tō-lōj'i-kal-i), adv. As regards physique or bodily frame; physically; from the point of view of somatology. Science, XII. 227.

somatology (sō'ma-tol'ō-jī), n. [= F. somatologie; < Gr. σῶμα(-r-), the body, + -λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] 1. The science of living or organized bodies, considered with regard only to their physical nature or structure. It includes natural history in the usual sense, as embracing zoology, botany, anatomy, and physiology, and differs from biology only in taking no account of mental or psychological phenomena. Also somatics.

2. More broadly, physics; the doctrine of material bodies or substances.—3. Specifically, the doctrine of the human body, as a department of anthropology; human anatomy and physiology; also, a treatise on this subject.—Anthropurgic somatology. See anthropurgic.

somatome (sō'ma-tōm), n. [For **somatotome*, < Gr. σῶμα(-r-), the body, + -τομος, < τέμνω, τομήν, cut.] An ideal section or segment of the body; one of the structural parts into which a body, especially a vertebrate body, is theoretically divisible. When actually so divided, the somatomes are the somites, metameres, arthromeres, diarthromeres, etc., which may exist in any given case. See somite.

somatonic (sō-mā-tōm'ik), a. [< somatome + -ic.] Having the nature, quality, or character of a somatome; dividing or segmenting a body into theoretic or actual somites; somitic; metameric.

somatopagus (sō-mā-tōp'ā-gus), n.; pl. somatopagi (-jī). [NL., < Gr. σῶμα (-τ-), the body, + πάγος, that which is fixed, < παγῖναι (γ' παγ), fix.] In teratol., a double monster with separate trunks.

somatoparallelus (sō'mā-tō-par-ā-lē'us), n.; pl. somatoparalleli (-lī). [NL., < Gr. σῶμα (-τ-), the body, + παράλληλος, beside one another: see parallel.] In teratol., a somatopagus with the axes of the two bodies parallel.

somatoplasm (sō'mā-tō-plāzm), n. [< Gr. σῶμα (-τ-), the body, + πλάσμα, anything formed or molded: see plasm.] Somatic plasma; the substance of the body.

My germ-plasm or idiomplasm of the first ontogenetic grade is not modified into the somatoplasm of Prof. Vinla. Nature, XLI, 320.

somatopleura (sō'mā-tō-plū'rā), n.; pl. somatopleurae (-rē). [NL.: see somatopleure.] Same as somatopleure.

The villousities of connective and vascular tissue, partly formed by the somatopleura. Micros. Sci., N. S., XXX, 352.

somatopleural (sō'mā-tō-plū'rāl), a. [< somatopleure + -al.] Of or pertaining to the somatopleure; forming or formed by the somatopleure; as, the somatopleural layer or division of mesoderm. Also somatopleuric.

somatopleure (sō'mā-tō-plūr), n. [< NL. somatopleura, < Gr. σῶμα (-τ-), the body, + πλευρά, the side.] The outer one of two divisions of the mesoderm of a four-layered germ, the inner one being the splanchnopleure. A germ that is three-layered—that is, consists of an ectoderm and an endoderm, with mesoderm between them—in most animals becomes four-layered by a splitting of the mesoderm into two layers, the outer or somatopleural and the inner or splanchnopleural, separated by a space which is the body-cavity or coelom. The somatopleure thus constitutes usually the great mass of the body, or the "flesh and bones" of ordinary language, together with its vessels, nerves, and other special structures—not, however, including the cerebrospinal axis of a vertebrate, which is derived from an invagination of ectoderm—while the splanchnopleure forms a portion of the substance of the intestinal tract and its annexes. Also somatopleura.

somatopleuric (sō'mā-tō-plūr'ik), a. [< somatopleure + -ic.] Same as somatopleural. Foster, Elem. of Embryol., p. 39.

somatotomy (sō-mā-tōt'ō-mī), n. [< Gr. σῶμα (-τ-), the body, + τομία, < τέμνειν, τεμνέω, cut.] The anatomy of the human body; anthropotomy; hominisection.

somatotridymus (sō'mā-tō-trid'i-mus), n.; pl. somatotridymī (-mī). [NL., < Gr. σῶμα (-τ-), the body, + τριδύμος, threefold.] In teratol., a monster having three bodies.

somatotropic (sō'mā-tō-trop'ik), a. [< Gr. σῶμα (-τ-), the body, + τροπός, < τρέπειν, turn, + -ic.] In bot., exhibiting or characterized by somatotropism.

somatotropism (sō-mā-tōt'rō-pizm), n. [< somatotropic + -ism.] In bot., a directive influence exerted upon growing organs by the mass of the substratum upon which they grow. This influence is not wholly due to the mere physical attraction between them, but is the result of a stimulating effect on what has been called the nerve-motility of the organ. Growing organs may be divided, according to their response to this influence, into two classes, the positively somatotropic, or those which tend to grow perpendicularly inward into the substratum, and negatively somatotropic, or those which tend to grow perpendicularly outward from the substratum.

somber, sombre (som'bēr), a. [= D. somber, formerly also sommer, < F. sombre = Sp. sambrio (= Pg. sombrio), shady, gloomy, < sombra (= Pg. sombra), shade, dark part of a picture, also a ghost (cf. asombrar, frighten); cf. OF. essombre, a shady place; prob. *< L. *exumbrare*, < ex, out, + umbra, shade (or, according to some, the Sp. Pg. forms are, like Pr. sotumbrar, shade, *< L. *subumbrare*, < sub, under, + umbra, shade): see umbra.] 1. Dark; dull; dusky; gloomy: as, a somber hue; somber clouds.

Webster, Duchess of Malfi.

Let her who has no hair, or has but some,

Plant Centinels before her Dressing-Room. Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love, iii.

3. In logic, at least one, perhaps all; but a few logicians sometimes employ a semidefinite some which implies a part, but not all. As commonly used in logic, a statement about some of a class, say that "some S is P," means that it is possible so to select an S that it shall be P; while "every S is P" means that whatever S be taken, it will be P. But when some and every occur in the same statement, it makes a difference which is chosen first. Thus, "every man knows some fact" may mean (1) that, first choosing any man, a fact may then be found which that man knows (which may be true or false); or it may mean (2) that a fact may be first selected such that, then, taking any man, he will know that fact (which may be expressed by saying that all men know some certain fact). When several *some*s and alls occur in the same statement, ordinary syntax fails to express the meaning with precision, and logicians resort to a special notation.

4. A certain indefinite or indeterminate number of: used before plural substantives: as, some years ago.

They hurried us aboard a bark,

Bore us some leagues to sea. Shak., Tempest, i. 2. 145.

A widow, somewhat old, and very poor.
Dryden, Cock and Fox, l. 2.

somewhen (sum'hwen), adv. [< some<sup>1</sup> + when.] At some time; indefinitely; some time or other. [Recent.]

Some folks can't help hoping . . . that they may have another chance to make things fair and even, somewhere, somewhen, somehow. Kingsley, Water Babies, viii.

Somewhen, before the dinner-bell. I cannot tie myself to the minute-hand of the clock, my dear child.
G. Meredith, Idiosyncrasy, xix.

somewhere (sum'hwēr), adv. [< ME. sumwher, sumwhare, sumwar; < some<sup>1</sup> + where.] 1. In some place or other; in a place or spot not known or not specified: as, he lives somewhere in this neighborhood; the line must be drawn somewhere.—2. To some unknown or unspecified place; somewhither.

Perhaps some merchant hath invited him,
And from the mart he's somewhere gone to dinner.
Shak., C. of E., II. 1. 5.

somewhile (sum'hwil), adv. [Early mod. E. somwhile, < ME. summelwile, sumwile, sumwile; < some<sup>1</sup> + while.] 1. Sometimes; at one time or another; from time to time; at times.

The silly wretches are compell'd som-while
To cut new channels for the course of Nile;
Sontimes som Cilles ruins to repair;
Sontimes to build huge Castles in the air.
Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II. the Lave.

somewhiles (sum'hwilz), adv. Sometimes; now and then.

Divers tall ships of London . . . had an ordinary and usual trade to Sleily, Candia, Seio, and somewhiles to Cyprus.
Hakluyt (Arber's Eug. Garner, I. 20).

somewhither (sum'hwiθ'er), adv. [< some<sup>1</sup> + whither.] To some place or other.

Somewhither would she have thee go with her.

Shak., Tit. And., iv. 1. 11.

somital (sô'mi-tl), a. [< somite + -al.] Same as somitte.

somite (sô'mit), n. [< Gr. σῶμα, body, + -ite<sup>2</sup>.] An actual somatome; any one morphological segment of an articulated body, such a body being viewed as composed of a longitudinal series of somites; an arthromere or metamere of an articulate invertebrate or a diarthromere of a vertebrate; such a segment considered with or without the appendages it may possess; in the latter restricted sense, a metamere minus its appendages, or a segment of the soma or trunk without the limbs it may bear. The term sometimes extends to ideal somatomes, or to the metameres of which an organism is theoretically assumed to consist; but it is especially applied to the actual segments of such invertebrates as insects, crustaceans, and worms, whose body-rings are usually evident, though some or other of them may coalesce, as into a cephalothorax, etc. In such cases the primitive or morphological somites are usually recognized and reckoned by their respective pairs of appendages. Separatosomites, continued throughout the body, are evident in the rings of earthworms and other annelids. In arthropods the typical number of somites is supposed to be twenty or twenty-one, numbers often actually recognizable. In insects the head is assumed to have six or seven somites, the thorax has normally three (see prothorax, mesothorax, and metathorax), and the abdomen is supposed to have ten or eleven. Each of these somites is invested and indicated by a body-ring or crust of integument, primitively or typically composed of eight sclerites, which may variously coalesce with one another, or with pieces of another somite, or both. Those sclerites which ordinarily remain distinct, and thus can be identified, take special names, as tergite, pleurite, sternite, cutum, præcutum, etc., epimeron, epipleuron, etc. Appendages of somites are limbs in the broadest sense, under whatever modifications; and these modifications are usually greatest at the cephalic and caudal ends of the body, as into eyes, stalks, antennæ, palpi, mandibles, maxillæ, maxillipeds or gnathopodites, etc., of the head, and stings, claspers, or other anal armature. Intermediate somitic appendages are ordinary legs and wings, as of the thorax of insects, and the pereopods, pleopods, elcra, rhipidura, telson, etc., of the thorax and abdomen of crustaceans. In worms such appendages chiefly occur in the form of parapodia (neuropodia and notopodia). See territe, and enter under Amphitrochæ, Aplys, Lutulus, Scorpioidea, Blattidae, and Cockroach.

somitte (sô'mit'ik), a. [< somite + -ic.] Having the character of a somite; somatonic; metameric; or pertaining to somites: as, the somitte divisions of the body; a somitte ring or joint; a somitte appendage.

These septa are metamerically arranged, one for each somitic constriction.

Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 243.

sommet. An old spelling of somel, sum<sup>2</sup>.

sommeil (so-mâil'), n. [< OF. (and F.) sommeil = Pr. souelh = Wall. someie, sleep, *< L. *somniaulus*, sleep (in deriv. somniaulosus, sleepy), dim. of somnus, sleep: see somnolent, etc.] 1. Sleep; slumber.—2. In old French operas, a quiet and tranquilizing air. Imp. Dict.

somnambulance (som-nam'bū-lans), n. [< somnambule + -ance.] Somnambulism. Science, VI. 78.

somnambulant (som-nam'bū-lant), u. [< L. somnus, sleep, + ambulan(t)s, ppr. of ambulare, walk: see somnambulate, etc.] Walking in sleep; sleeping while in motion; also, characterized by somnambulism.

The midnight hush is deep,
But the pines—the spirits distrest—
They move in somnambulant sleep—
They whisper and are not at rest.

J. H. Borer, Moonlight in the Pines.

somnambular (som-nam'bū-lir), a. [< somnambule + -ar<sup>3</sup>.] Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of sleep-walking or sleep-walkers.

The palpitating peaks [Alps] break out Estatic from somnambular repose.

Mrs. Browning, Napoleon III. in Italy.

somnambulate (som-nam'bū-lit), v.; pret. and pp. somnambulated, ppr. somnambulating. [< L.

somnus, sleep, + ambulus, pp. of ambulare, walk: see amble, ambulate.] I. intrans. To walk in sleep; wander in a state of sleep, as a somnambulist.

II. trans. To walk on or over in sleep.

It is the bright May month; his Eminence again somnambulates the Promenade de la Rose.
Carlyle, Diamond Necklace, xiv.

somnambulation (som-nam'bū-lā'shon), n. [< somnambulate + -ion.] The act of walking in sleep; somnambulism. Imp. Dict.

somnambule (som-nam'būl), n. [< F. somnambule = Sp. somniubulo, somnambulo = Pg. somnambulo = It. sonnambolo, somnambulo, < L. somnus, sleep, + ambulare, walk: see amble, ambulate.] A somnambulist.

The owner of a ring was unhesitatingly found out from amongst a company of twelve, the ring having been withdrawn from the finger before the somnambule was introduced.
Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, I. 241.

somnambule (som-nam'bū-lik), a. [< somnambule + -ic.] Of or pertaining to somnambulism or somnambulists.

I have, however, lately met with well-marked cases of it in two of my own acquaintance, who gave descriptions of their somnambule experiences.
E. Gurney, in Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, II. 63.

somnambulism (sou-nam'bū-lizm), n. [= F. somnambulisme = Sp. somnambulismo, somnambulismo = Pg. sonnambulismo = It. sonnambulismo; as somnambule + -ism.] The act of walking about, with the performance of apparently purposive acts, while in a state intermediate between sleep and waking. The sleeping condition is shown by the absence of the usual reaction to sense-impressions, and usually by the failure to recall what has been done during the somnambulist period. With many recent writers, however, the word is used, quite independently of any consideration of movements which the somnambulist may or does execute, as nearly synonymous with trance, incarnation, or hypnotism, and exactly so with somnolism. It is generally considered under the two main conditions of the idiopathic, spontaneous, or self-induced and the artificial or induced. Compare somnific. Also called, rarely, noctambulism.

In somnambulism, natural or induced, there is often a great display of intellectual activity, followed by complete oblivion of all that has passed.
W. James, Prin. of Psychology, I. 201.

Somnambulism is, as a rule, a decidedly deeper state than the lighter stage of hypnotism.
E. Gurney, in Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, II. 63.

somnambulist (som-nam'bū-list), n. [As somnambule + -ist.] One who is subject to somnambulism; a person who walks in his sleep.

somnambulist (sou-nam'bū-lis'tik), a. [< somnambulist + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of somnambulism or somnambulists.

somnambulous (som-nam'bū-lus), a. Somnambulist. Dunglison.

somnert, n. See summer.

somnia, n. Plural of somnium.

somnial (som'ni-āl), u. [< L. somnialis, of or pertaining to dreams, < somnium, a dream, < somnus, sleep: see somnolent.] Pertaining to or involving dreams; relating to dreams. [Rare.]

To press or foretell an evil, especially in what concerneth the exploits of the soul, in matter of somnial divinations.
Urquhart, tr. of Isabel, III. 14.

The somnial magic superinduced on, without suspending, the active powers of the mind. Coleridge.

somniative (som'ni-ā-tiv), a. [< L. somniatus (pp. of somniare, dream, < somnium, a dream) + -ive.] Pertaining to dreaming; relating to or producing dreams. Coleridge. [Rare.]

somniatory (som'ni-ā-tō-ri), a. [< L. somniatus, pp. of somniare, dream, + -ory.] Of or pertaining to dreams or dreaming; relating to or producing dreams; somniative. [Rare.]

The better reading, explaining, and unfolding of these somniatory vaticinations, and predictions of that nature.
Urquhart, tr. of Isabel, III. 13.

somnolent (som-nō-lent), a. [< L. somnolentus, inclined to sleep, drowsy, *< *somniaulus*, dim. of somnus, sleep: see sommeil, somnolent.] Inclined to sleep; drowsy. Bailey, 1727.

somnolent (som-nō-lent), a. [< L. somnolentus, sleep, + facient (t), ppr. of facere, make: see facient.] I. A. Somnific; soporific; tending to produce sleep.

II. n. That which causes or induces sleep; a soporific.

somniferous (som-nif'g-rus), a. [= F. somnifère = Sp. somnifero = Pg. somnifero = It. sonnifero, < L. somnus, sleep, + ferre, bring, = E. bear<sup>1</sup>.] Causing or inducing sleep; soporific: as, a somniferous drug.

'Twas I that ministred to her chaste blood
A true somniferous potion, which did steal
Her thoughts to sleep, and flattered her with death.
Dekker, Satiromastix (Works, 1873, I. 255).

somnify (som-uif'g-ri), n. [Irreg. < L. somnifer, sleep-bringing: see somniferous.] A place of sleep. [Rare.]

Somnus, awake; vlocke the rustie late
That leads into the caue's somniferie.
Tourneur, Transformed Metamorphosis, st. 36.

somnific (som-nif'ik), a. [< L. somnificus, causing sleep, < somnus, sleep, + facere, make, cause.] Causing sleep; tending to induce sleep; somniferous; soporific.

The voice, the manner, the matter, even the very atmosphere and the streamy candle-light, were all alike somnific.
Southey, The Doctor, vi. A. 1. (Davies.)

somnifugous (som-nif'g-us), a. [< L. somnus, sleep, + fugere, flee.] Driving away sleep; preventing sleep; agrypnotic. Bailey, 1731.

somniloquence (som-nil'ô-kwens), n. [< L. somnus, sleep, + loquens, a talking, < loqui, talk, speak.] The act or habit of talking in sleep; somniloquism.

somniloquism (som-nil'ô-kwizm), n. [< somniloquens + -ism.] Somniloquence or sleep-talking.

somniloquist (som-nil'ô-kwist), n. [< somniloquens + -ist.] One who talks in his sleep.

somniloquous (som-nil'ô-kwus), a. [= F. somniloque = Sp. somniloquio, < L. somnus, sleep, + loqui, speak.] Apt to talk in sleep; given to talking in sleep.

somniloquy (som-nil'ô-kwi), n. [< L. somnus, sleep, + loqui, speak.] The act of talking in sleep; specifically, talking in the somnambulistic sleep.

somnivolency (som-niv'ô-len-si), n.; pl. somnivolencies (-siz). [< L. somnus, sleep, + LL. volentia, will, inclination, < L. volen(t)-s, ppr. of velle, will: see will.] Something that induces sleep; a soporific; a somnificient. [Rare.]

If these somnivolencies (I take the word opales on this occasion) have turned her head, that is an effect they frequently have upon some constitutions.
Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, IV. xii.

somnolence (som'nō-lens), n. [< ME. somnolence, somnolence, < OF. somnolence, somnolence, F. somnolence = Pr. somnolencia = Sp. Pg. somnolencia = It. sonnolenza, < L. somnolentia, somnulentia, ML. also somnolentia, somnulentia, sleepiness, < L. somnolentus, somnulentus, sleepy: see somnolent.] 1. Sleepiness; drowsiness; inclination to sleep; sluggishness.

Thanne cometh somnolence, that is slobby slombrynce, which maketh n man be hevy and dul in body and in soule.
Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

His power of sleeping, and his somnolence when he imagined he was awake, were his two most prominent characteristics.
D. M. Wallace, Russia, v.

2. In pathol., a state intermediate between sleeping and waking.

somnolency (sem'nō-len-si), n. [As somnolence (see -cy).] Same as somnolence.

somnolent (som'nō-lent), a. [< ME. somnolent, < OF. somnolent, somnolent, F. somnolent = Pr. somnolent = Sp. somnoliento = Pg. somnolento = It. sonnolento, < L. somnolentus, somnulentus, ML. also somnolentus, sleepy, drowsy, < L. somnus, sleep (= Gr. ύπνος, sleep), akin to sapor, sleep, = AS. svefan, sleep, svef'n, a dream: see svefen, and cf. sopor, hypnotic, etc.] Sleepy; drowsy; inclined to sleep; sluggish.

The Sperhauke Castell named is and rad,
Where it behouth to wache nightes three Without any somnolent slepe to be.
Rom. of Partheny (E. E. T. S.), I. 5376.

He had no eye for such phenomena, because he had a somnolent want of interest in them.
De Quincey, (Imp. Dict.)

somnolently (som'nō-lent-li), adv. Drowsily.

somnolescent (sem-nō-les'ent), a. [< somnolent + -escent.] Half-asleep; somnolent; drowsy.

The mild dog . . . shelters itself in obscure places—frequently in ditches by the roadside—and lies there in a somnolescent state for perhaps hours.
Eneyce, Brit., XX. 261.

somnolism (som'nō-lizm), n. [< somnolent + -ism.] The state of being in mesmeric sleep; the doctrine of mesmeric sleep. Imp. Dict.

Somnus (som'nus), n. [< L. somnus, sleep: see somnolent.] In Rom. myth., the personification and god of sleep, the Greek Hypnos, a brother of Death (Mors or Thanatos), and a son of Night (Nox). In works of art Sleep and Death are represented alike as youths, often sleeping or holding inverted torches. Compare ent under Thanatos.

The other, which, for want of a proper English word, I must call the songish part, must abound in the softness and variety of numbers, its principal intention being to please the hearing. Dryden, Albion and Albanians, Pref.

songle (sông'gl), n. [Formerly also songal, songow; a var. of single<sup>1</sup>, in same sense.] A handful of gleanings. [Prov. Eng.]

I have just this last week obtained a goodly songle of S. Staffordshire words.

N. and Q., 7th ser., VIII. 303.

songless (sông'les), a. [< song<sup>1</sup> + -less.] 1. Without song; not singing.

Silent rows the songless gondolier.

2. In ornith.: (a) Not singing; unable to sing; not a singer; as, the female mocking-bird is songless; most birds are songless in winter. (b) Having no singing-apparatus, and consequently unable to sing; not a song-bird; non-oscine; elamatorial or mesomyodion, as a passerine bird: as, the Mesomyodion, or songless Pussers.

songman (sông'mân), n.; pl. songmen (-men). 1. A singer, especially a singer of songs; a gleeman.

She hath made me four and twenty nosegays for the shearers, three-man song-men oil, and very good ones.

Shak., W. T., iv. 3. 45.

2. A lay vicar. See lay<sup>4</sup>.

song-muscle (sông'mus'f), n. In ornith., any muscle of the syrinx or lower larynx of a bird concerned in the act of singing, by the operation of which the voice is modulated; any muscle of vocalization. These syringeal muscles reach their highest development in number and complexity of arrangement in the Oscines, Polymyodion, or Acromyodion, in which group of birds there are normally five pairs — the tensor posterior longus, tensor anterior longus, tensor posterior brevis, tensor anterior brevis, and sternotrachealis.

There is no question of its being by the action of the syringeal muscles . . . that the expansion of the brouchi, both as to length and diameter, is controlled, and, as thereby the sounds uttered by the bird are modified, they are properly called the Song-muscles.

A. Newton, Eneye Brit., XVIII. 20.

song-sparrow (sông'spar'ô), n. 1. The hedge-sparrow, Acentor modularis. See cut under Acentor. [Eng.] — 2. A small fringilline bird of North America, of the genus Melospiza, a sweet songster, with a streaked brown, gray, and white plumage without any yellow. The best-known is M. fasciata, one of the most familiar birds of the eastern half of the country; there are several other species or varieties in the west, the most distinct of which is the Kodiak song-sparrow, M. cinerea. The common species is 6 inches long and 5½ in extent of wings, and the markings of the breast are gathered into a characteristic pectoral spot.

It nests on the ground, and lays four or five spotted and clouded eggs. Its song is remarkably sweet and hearty, and the plain little bird is deservedly a great favorite. It is also called silver-tongue. — Oregon song-sparrow, Melospiza fasciata guttata, a western variety of the common song-sparrow.

songster (sông'stêr), n. [*< ME. *songstre* (f), < *AS. *sangstre*, sangistre, sangstre, n femmlo singer, < sang, song, + fein, suffix -estre, E. -ster. Cf. songer.] 1. One who or that which sings or is skilled in singing.

Every songster had sung out his fit.

B. Jonson, Neptune's Triumph.

Specifically, in ornith.: (a) A singer; a singing bird. (b) pl. Specifically, singing birds: the Oscines, Cantores, Cantatores, Acromyodion, or Polymyodion.

2. A writer of songs or poems.

Silk will draw some sneaking songster thither.

It is a rhyming ace, and verses swarm

At every tale. B. Jonson, An Elegy (Underwoods, Ix).

songstress (sông'stres), n. [< songster + -ess.] A female singer; also, a female singing bird.

The trill . . .

Of that shy songstress, whose love-tale

Might tempt an angel to descend,

While hovering o'er the moonlight vale.

Wordsworth, Power of Sound.

song-thrush (sông'thrush), n. One of the common thrushes of Europe, Turdus musicus; the mavis or throstle, closely related to the mistle-thrush, redwing, and fieldfare. It is 9 inches in length, and 14 in extent of wings. The upper parts are yellowish-brown, reddening on the head; the wing-coverts are tipped with reddish-yellow; the fore neck and breast are yellowish, with brownish-black narrow heads; the lower wing-coverts are reddish-yellow; and the belly is white. See cut under thrush.

sonification (son-i-fak'shon), n. [< L. sonus, sound, + factio(n-), < facere, produce.] The production of sound; a noise-making; especially, the stridulation of insects, as distinguished from vocalization: as, the sonification of the cicada or katydid.

A mode of sonification . . . similar to that where a boy runs along a fence pushing a stick against the pickets.

Stand. Nat. Hist., II. 307.

sonifer (son-i-fêr), n. [< L. sonus, sound, + ferre = E. bear<sup>1</sup>.] An acoustic instrument for collecting sound and conveying it to the ear of a partially deaf person. I have a sonnet that will serve the turn.

Shak., T. G. of V., lii. 2. 93.

Teach me some melodious sonnet,

Sung by flaming tongues above.

R. Robinson, Come, Thou Fount of Every Blessing.

Specifically — 2. A short poem in fixed form, limited to fourteen lines with a prescribed disposition of rimes. The form is of Italian origin. A sonnet is generally written in decasyllabic or five-foot measure; but it may be written in octosyllables. It consists of two divisions or groups of lines — (1) a major group of eight lines or two quatrains, and (2) a minor group of six lines or two tercets. The quatrains are arranged thus: a, b, b, a; a, b, b, a; the tercets, either c, d, c, d, c, d, or c, d, c, c, d, e. In modern French examples the order of the tercets is generally c, c, d, c, d, e. There are various deviations from the sonnet as thus described; but by purists the above is regarded as the orthodox form, established by long practice and prescription, all others being ranked simply as quatorzains, or what Lamb called fourteeners. With regard to the material of the poem, it is generally considered that it should be the expression of a single thought, idea, or sentiment.

I can bestow allow to call those Sonnets which are of fourteen lynes, every line conteyning tenne syllables.

Cf. sophomore.] A false argumentation devised for the exercise of one's ingenuity or for the purpose of deceit; sometimes, a logically false argumentation; a fallacy. The word is especially applied to certain ancient tricks of reasoning, which before the systematization of logic and grammar had a real value, and were treated as important secrets. For the various kinds of sophism, see fallacy.

This day no herde I of your tongue a word,

I trowe ye studie aboute some sophisme.

Chaucer, Prolog, to Clerk's Tale, l. 5.

Some other reasons there are . . . which seem to have been objected . . . for the exercise of men's wits in dissolving sophisms.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, viii. 4.

The litigious sophism. See litigious. = Syn. A sophism is an argument known to be unsound by him who uses it; paralogism is an unsound argument used without knowledge of its unsoundness. Paralogism is a strictly technical word of logic; sophism is not. Sophistry applies to reasoning as sophism to a single argument. See fallacy.

sophist (sof'ist), n. [In ME. sophister, q. v.; < F. sophiste = Pr. sophista = Sp. sophista = Pg. sophista, sophista = It. sophista = D. sophist = G. sophist = Sw. Dan. sophist, < LL. sophista, a sophist, < Gr. σοφιστής, a master of one's craft, a wise or prudent man, a teacher of arts and sciences for money, a sophist (see def. 2), < σοφίζω, make wise, instruct, in pass. be or become wise, dep. deal or argue subtly, be a sophist, < σοφός, skilled, intelligent, learned, clever, wise; cf. σοφός, clear; perhaps akin to L. sapere, taste, > sapiens, wise: see sapient.] 1. One who is skilled or versed in a thing; a specialist. — 2. An ancient Greek philosophic and rhetorical teacher who took pay for teaching virtue, the management of a household or the government of a state, and all that pertains to wise action or speech. Sophists taught before the development of logic and grammar, when skill in reasoning and in disputation could not be accurately distinguished, and thus they came to attach great value to quibbles, which soon brought them into contempt.

Love teacheth a man to carry himself better than the sophist or preceptor.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, li.

The Sophists did not profess to teach a man his duty as distinct from his interest, or his interest as distinct from his duty, but Good Conduct conceived as duty and interest identified.

H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 94.

Hence — 3. A captious or fallacious reasoner; a quibbler.

Dark-brow'd sophist, come not near;

All the place is holy ground;

Hollow smile and frozen sneer

Come not here.

Tennyson, The Poet's Mind.

sophister (sof'is-tēr), n. [*< ME. sophister, sofyster, < OF. *sophistre, a var. of sophiste, a sophist: see sophist*. The term -er is unorigi-

nal. as in philosopher.] 1. A man of learning; a teacher; specifically, a professional teacher of philosophy; a sophist.

And gyt thei seien sotilliche, and so doth the Sarmysyns, That Iesus was bote n Iogelour, a Taper a-monge the comynne.

And a sophist of sorcery and pseudo-propheta.

Piers Plowman (C), xviii, 311.

As the sophister said in the Greek comedy, "Clouds become nny thing as they are represented."

Some verbose Fourth of July oration, or some sophomorical newspaper declamation. H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 435.

Sophora (sōf'ō-rā), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1737), < Ar. sofāra, a yellow plant (applied to one faded), < asfar, yellow: see saffron.] A genus of leguminous plants, of the suborder Papilionaceae, type of the tribe Sophoreae. It is characterized by flowers with a broadly obovate or orbicular banner-petal and oblong wings and keel, grouped in terminal racemes or panicles, and followed by thick or roundish or four-winged pods which are constricted into a succession of necklike-liko joints (see cut under moniliform), and are usually indehiscent. There are about 50 species, natives of warm regions of both hemispheres. They are trees and shrubs, rarely perennial herbs, and bear odd-pinnate leaves, usually with very numerous small leaflets, but sometimes only a few, and then large and rigid. The flowers are white, yellow, or violet, and highly ornamental. Three species occur within the United States: S. secundiflora, the coral-bean of Texas (see frigitola); S. afinis, a small tree of Arkansas and Texas, with hard, heavy, coarse-grained, yellow and finally red wood, and resinous pods, from which a domestic ink is made; and S. tomentosa, a shrub of the Florida coast, with showy yellow flowers, also widely distributed along tropical shores of America, Africa, and Australia, and abundant on Fiji Island seabeaches, where it is known as kau-ni-alewa, or women's-tree. S. tetralera of New Zealand is there known as la-burnum or kouhai (for its variety Macnabiana, see pelu). S. Japonica is the Chinese or Japanese pagoda-tree or yem-jin, a very handsome quick-growing tree reaching 60 feet in height, with dark-green younger branches and deep blue-green leaves, sometimes cultivated, especially for its large panicles of small whitish autumnal flowers. Its hard compact wood is valued for turners' work; all parts are purgative; the austere pulp of the pods dyes yellow; and the flowers (called in Chinese wei-fa) furnish a yellow dye greatly valued in China. For this the tree is cultivated in several provinces, from which the dried flowers are exported in small sacks and used to dye blue cloth green, and to dye yellow the silk garments of the mandarins and the rush-mats which form the Chinese sails, beds, bags, and floor-matting.

Sophoreæ (sô-fô-rê-ô), n. pl. [NL. (Sprongel, 1802), < Sophora + -æ.] A tribe of leguminous plants, characterized by a commonly arborescent or high-climbing habit, pinnate leaves of five or numerous leaflets or of a single large leaflet, and flowers with ten free stamens. It contains about 34 genera, of which Sophora is the type, natives chiefly of the tropics, and largely of the southern hemisphere in America and Africa. For other important genera, see Myroxylin and Cladrastis. The latter is the chief genus represented in the United States; another, Campesia, a lofty-climbing African shrub with handsome and gigantic flowers, is an exception in its trifoliate leaves. See cut under yellow-wood.

sophrosyne (sô-fros'i-nô), n. [Gr. σοφροσύνη, discretion, temperance, < σώφρων, earlier σάφρων, of sound mind, temperate, < σάφ, orig. **σαδ*, sound, whole, safe, + φρῆν, mind.] The quality of wise moderation; sound-mindedness; discreet good sense; referring especially to Greek art and philosophy.

sopite (sô-pit), v. t.; pret. and pp. sopited, pp. sopiting. [L. sopitus, pp. of sopire, put to sleep, lay at rest, settle, quiet (> It. sopire, quench, suppress); see sopor.] To put to sleep; set at rest; quiet; silence; specifically, in Scots law, to quash.

He is much offended that you do stickle and keep on foot such questions, which may be better sopied and silenced than maintained and drawn into sidings and par-takings. Wood, Athenæ Oxon., II, 332.

What could a woman desire in a match, more than the sopiting of a very dangerous claim, and the alliance of a son-in-law, noble, brave, well-gifted, and highly connected? Scott, Bride of Lammermoor, xviii.

sopition (sô-pish'ôn), n. [L. sopite + -ion.] The act of sopiting, or putting to sleep; also, the state of being put to sleep; deep slumber; dormancy; lethargy.

As for demutation, sopition of reason, and the diviner particle, from drink, though American religion approve, and Pagan piety of old hath practised it, . . . Christian morality and the doctrine of Christ will not allow it. Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Err., v. 23.

sopor (sô'por), n. [= F. sopor, sopore = Sp. pg. sopor = It. sopore, < L. sopor, deep sleep, orig. **svapor*, akin to somnus, orig. **sojmus*, **svajmus*, sleep, = Gr. ἵπνος, sleep; see somnolent, surceren.] A deep, unnatural sleep; lethargy; stupor.

To awaken the Christian world out of this deep sopor or lethargy. Dr. H. More, Mystery of Iniquity, II, Pref. (Encyc. Diet.)

soporatè (sô'por-ät), v. t. [L. soporatus, pp. of soporare, put to sleep, stupefy, < sopor, deep sleep; see sopor.] To stupefy; make sleepy.

It would be but a resurrection to another sleep: the soul seeming not to be thoroughly awake here, but as it were soporated, with the dull stems and opiate vapours of this gross body. Cadworth, Intellectual System, p. 795.

soporiferous (sô-pô-rif'ô-rus), a. [= F. soporifere = Sp. soporifero = Pg. It. soporifero, < L. soporifer, sleep-bringing, < sopor, deep sleep, + ferre = E. bear.] 1. Causing or tending to cause sleep; soporific.

The soporiferous medicines . . . are henbane, hemlock, mandrake, moonshade, tobacco, opium. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 76.

2. Sleepy; somnolent.

Hark, you sluggish soporiferous villans! there's knaves abroad when you are a-bed. Middleton, Phenix, III, 1.

soporiferously (sô-pô-rif'ô-rus-li), adv. In a soporiferous manner; so as to produce sleep. Imp. Diet.

soporiferousness (sô-pô-rif'ô-rus-nes), n. The quality of being soporiferous; the property of causing sleep.

soporific (sô-pô-rif'ik), a. and n. [= F. soporifique = Sp. soporifico = Pg. It. soporifico, < L. **soporificus*, < sopor, deep sleep, + facere, make.] 1. a. Tending to produce sleep.

The colour and taste of opium are, as well as its soporific or anodyne virtues, mere powers depending on its primary qualities, whereby it is fitted to produce different operations on different parts of our bodies.

Locke, Human Understanding, II, xxiii.

II. n. Anything which causes sleep, as certain medicines.

Nor has rhubarb always proved a purge, or opium a soporific, to every one who has taken these medicines. Hume, Inquiry Concerning Human Understanding, vi.

soporose (sô'pô-rôs), a. [L. sopor, deep sleep, + -ose.] Same as soporous. Imp. Diet.

soporous (sô'pô-rus), a. [L. sopor, deep sleep, + -ous.] Causing deep sleep.

In small synopses it may perhaps rouse the spirits a little, but in soporous diseases it is commonly an uncertain and ineffectual remedy. Greenhill, Art of Embalming, p. 68.

sopper (sep'ôr), n. [< sop + -er.] One who sops or dips in liquor something to be eaten. Imp. Diet.

sopping (sop'ing), a. [< sop, v.] Soaking, soaked, or drenched, as with rain.

soppy (sop'i), a. [< sop + -y.] Wet; soaked; abounding in moisture; as, a soppy day.

It [Yarrowth] looked rather spongy and soppy, I thought. Dickens, David Copperfield, III.

How damp and cheerless the houses . . . looked in the soppy hollows where the high meadows were richest! Harper's Mag., LXIX, 330.

sopra (sô'prü), adv. [It., < L. sopra, above, over; see sopra.] In music, above; as, come sopra, as above; nella parte di sopra, in the upper or higher part.

soprani, n. Italian plural of soprano.

soprano (sô'prü-nist), n. [< soprano + -ist.] A soprano or treble singer: sometimes used attributively.

Hencshoo, . . . one of the most famous of the soprano singers who flourished in the last century. Grove, Dict. Music, III, 461.

soprano (sô'prü-nô), n. and a. [= F. soprano = Sp. soprano = D. sopraan = G. Sw. Dan. sopran, < It. soprano, the treble in music, lit. high, identical with soprano, sorrano, supreme, sovereign, = Sp. Pg. sobrano = F. souverain, > E. sovereign; see sovereign, sorran.] 1. n.; It. pl. soprani (sô'prü-ni), E. pl. sopranos (-nôz). 1. In music, the highest variety of the female voice; treble. It ranges easily from about middle C upward two octaves or more, and is characterized by a comparatively thin and incisive quality, usually combined with marked flexibility. Soprano is also the higher voice of boys, and is sometimes accidentally or artificially preserved among men. It is the most important and effective voice for all kinds of solo singing, and is that to which is assigned the chief melody in modern choral music. A voice whose compass and quality are intermediate between soprano and alto is called mezzo-soprano. 2. A singer with such a voice.

Soprano, basso, even the contra-alto. Wish'd him five fathoms under the Baltic. Byron, Beppo, xxxii.

3. A voice-part for or sung by such a voice.—Natural soprano, a male singer who produces tones of soprano pitch and quality by means of an unusually developed falsetto.—Soprano sfogato. See sfogato.

II. a. Pertaining to the soprano: as, soprano music; a soprano voice; the soprano compass.—Soprano clef, in musical notation, a C clef when placed on the lower line of a staff. See clef.—Soprano string. Same as chanterelle, 1.

sora (sô'rî), n. [Also sorce.] A crane; a small short-billed rail, of the subfamily Rallina and genus Porzana. Specifically, in the United States, P. carolina, the Carolina rail, sora-rail, or sorce, which thrives in the marshes of the Atlantic coast in the autumn, furnishes the sport, and is highly esteemed for the table. It is olive-brown above, varied with black and with many sharp white streaks and spots; the belly is whitish; the vent is rufescent; the lining of the wings is barred with black and white. In the fall the throat and breast are plain brownish, but in breeding-dress these parts are slate-colored, and the face and throat are black. The length is 8 or 9 inches, the extent of wings 12 or 13. Sometimes misnamed ortolan (which see). See cut under Porzana.

soraget, n. [Also sorrage and sorage (as if < sore + age); < F. **sorage*, saurage, the first year of a falcon before it has molted, < sor, saur, sore, sorrel; see sore.] 1. In falconry, the period from the time when a hawk is taken from the nest until she mews her feathers.

If her downy sorage she but ruffo So strong a dove, may it be thought enough. Quarles, Feast for Worms. (Wright.)

2. The blades of green wheat or barley. Bailley, 1731 (spelled sorage).

sorahes, n. Same as sura-hai.

sorance (sôr'ans), n. [Also sorrance; < sore, n., + -ance.] Soroness; a sore feeling.

The malady of the joints comprehendeth all griefes and sorances that be in the joints. Topcott, Four-Footed Beasts (1607), p. 341. (Intell.)

Seldom or never complain they of any sorance in other parts of the body. Holland.

sora-rail (sô'rî-râl), n. Same as sora. Sorastrea (sô-ras'trê-ô), n. pl. [NL., < Sorastrium + -æ.] A small order of fresh-water algae, of the class Cenobiceæ, distinguished by the fact that the cenobium is uniciliated. Sorastrium is the typical genus.

Sorastrium (sô-ras'trum), n. [NL. (Kützinger), so called in allusion to the shape of the colonies of cells; < Gr. σῶρος, a heap, + ἀστρον, a star.] A genus of fresh-water algae, of the class Cenobiceæ, and typical of the order Sorastrea. The cenobium is globose, solid within, free-swimming, and composed of 4, 8, 16, or 32 compressed wedge-shaped cells, which are sinuate, emarginate, or bilobed at the apex and radiately disposed. S. spinulosum is the only species found in North America.

sorb (sôr'b), n. [Early mod. E. sorbe, < OF. sorbe, F. sorbe, dial. sourbe = Sp. sorba, serba = Pg. sorra = It. sorbo, sorba = D. sorbe = Pol. sorba, < L. sorbis, the sorb-tree, sorbum, the fruit of the sorb-tree; see Sorbus. Cf. serve (a doublet of sorb) and serice.] 1. The service-tree, Pyrus (Sorbus) domestica. The wild service-tree, Pyrus torminalis, is included under the name by Gerard, and is also often so called in more recent times. The mountain-ash, P. aucuparia, and other species of the old genus Sorbus are also likely to have been so called.

In lichenol., bearing or producing soredia.

sorediferous (sô-rô-dif'ê-rus), a. [*< NL. sor-
ate; bearing soredia.

soredium (sô-rô-di-um), n.; pl. soredia (-i-).
[NL., < Gr. σώφω, a heap, + -idium, for Gr. -idiōr, a dim. suffix.] In lichenol., a single algal cell or a group of algal cells wrapped in more or less hyphal tissue, which serves the purpose of vegetative propagation: commonly in the plural.

Such cells form little heaps or cushion-like masses breaking through the surface of the thallus, and when set free from the thallus are able to grow at once into new thalli. Usually one species of alga furnishes all the algal cells of a lichen; more rarely two, and then one prevails in abundance over the other. The same species of alga, however, may be found in conjunction with different species of fungus, and taking part in the composition, therefore, of differently formed thalli—that is, different lichens. See Lichenes.
Also soredia and brood-bud.

soree (sô-rê), n. A variant of sara. [U. S.]

Soree. Bah-bird.

T. Jefferson, Notes on Virginia (ed. 1788), p. 74.

sore-eagle (sô-rê'g'l), n. [Also soar-eagle; prob.
formed in imitation of sore-falcon; < sore<sup>2</sup> + eagle.] A young eagle.

A soar-eagle would not stoop at a flye.

Milton, On the Def. of Humb. Remonat.

sore-eyed (sôr'îl), a. 1. Having sore eyes.—
2. Having orbital caruncles, as if sores: as, the sore-eyed pigran. See ent under sheathbill.

sore-falcon (sôr'fû'kû), n. [Formerly also soar-falcon, saure faucon; < sore<sup>2</sup> + falcon, tr. OF.
faucon sor.] A falcon of the first year; a young falcon. See sore<sup>2</sup>, 1.

Of the soare faucon so I learne to fly,

That flaps while her fluttering wings beneath,

Till she her selfe for stronger flight can breathe.

Spenser, Hymn of Heavenly Beauty, l. 26.

sore-hawk (sôr'hâk), n. Same as sore-falcon.

sorehead (sôr'hed), n. 1. One whose head is sore. Hence—2. An irritable, discontented person; one who has a real or fancied grievance; in political use, a person who is dissatisfied through lack of recognition or reward for party services. [Slang, U. S.]

Every sore-head and bolter in the Majority voted with his party.

The American, X. 33.

The public don't care for a few soreheads and impracticals in an operation that is going to open up the whole Southwest. C. D. Warner, Little Journey in the World, xv.

soreheaded (sôr'hed'ed), a. Having the character of a sorehead; discontented; having a grievance. [Slang, U. S.]

sorehon (sôr'hon), n. [Said to be an Ir. corrupted form equiv. to Sc. sorn, a contracted form of ME. sojourn, a sojourn, as a verb sojourn: see sojourn, sorn.] In Ireland, a tax formally imposed upon tenants for the maintenance of their lord or his men: a custom which required a tenant to maintain his chieftain gratuitously. See the second quotation.

Yea, and the verye wilde Irish exactiōs, as Coligny, Liverye, Sorehon, and such like, by which they pole and utterlye undoe the poore tenants and free-holders.

Spenser, State of Ireland (ed. Todd).

Sorehon was a tax take upon the free-holders for certain days in each quarter of a yeare, to finde victuals, and lodging, and to pay certayne stipends to the kerne, gallo-glasses, and horsemen.

Sir J. Ware, Note in Todd's Spenser.

sorel<sup>1</sup>. An old spelling of sorrel<sup>1</sup>, sorrel<sup>2</sup>.

Nes heo newero swa sarlic.

Layamon, l. 23457.

sorely (sôr'li), adv. [< ME. sarliche, < AS. sārlicc (= Icel. sārlic), sorely, < sārlic, soro: see sorely, a.] In a sore manner; painfully; sadly; violently; severely; extremely.

sorema (sô-rê'mâ), n. [NL., < Gr. σώφω, a heap.]
In bot., a heap of carpels belonging to one flower, as in the magnolia and liriodendron.

soreness (sôr'nes), n. The state of being sore, in any sense of the word.

Sorex (sô'rêks), n. [NL., < L. sorex = Gr. ῥάξ, a shrew, shrew-mouse. Cf. Hyrax.] The typical genus of the family Sorioidæ and subfamily Soricinæ, containing numerous small terrestrial shrews of both hemispheres. They have from 23 to 32 colored teeth, moderately long well-haired tail and ears, and feet not oared. The typical dentition of Sorex in the most restricted sense is 32 teeth, of which the upper incisors are 5, the (unspecialized canines and) upper premolars 6, the upper molars 6, and the total of the lower teeth 12 (as nearly constant throughout the family). S. vulgaris is the common shrew of Europe, and S. platyrhin- nus is a common one in North America. See shrew<sup>2</sup>.

sorgho (sôr'gô), n. Same as sorghum, 1. Also sorgo.

sorghum (sôr'gum), n. [Formerly also sorgum, also sometimes sorgo, sorgho, F. sorgho, < Sp.
Pg. sorgo = It. sorgo, surgo; < NL. sorgum, sorghum, < ML. surgum, surgum, surgum, Indian millet, sorghum; prob. of E. Ind. origin.] 1.
A plant of the former genus Sorghum, commonly the cultivated saccharine plant once known as Sorghum (or Holcus) saccharatum, lately considered a variety of S. vulgare, but now classified as Andropogon Sorghum, var. saccharatus.
It is a cane-like grass, with the stature and habit of broom-corn, or of the taller varieties of Indian corn, but more slender than the latter, without ears, and of a glaucous hue. Sorghum is cultivated throughout Africa, in forms called imphar, chiefly for the sweet juice of the cane. In the United States it has been employed for many years to make syrup, for which purpose it is more or less grown in every State. It has also been the subject of much experiment in sugar-making, and according to Wiley is now practically available for this purpose. The name is also applied to the var. Halepense, and possibly to others of the same species. See def. 2. Also called Chinese sugar cane.

2. [cap.] [NL. (Micheli, 1729).] A former genus of grasses, of the tribe Andropogoneæ, now included as a subgenus in Andropogon (Eleu-nari Duckel, 1889). Like the rest of the genus, it has one-flowered spikelets disposed in pairs at the joints of a rachis, one of each pair pedicelled, one sessile. The sessile spikelet is in all the pairs alike; the flower is fertile, and in the pedicelled spike-lets male, neutral, or abortive. The rachis is fragile, or in culture tenuous; its joints and the pedicels are biliform, and convex on the back or flat without furrow. The sessile spikelet and grain are somewhat compressed on the back, or in cultivation sometimes nearly globose.
The species are most often tall and thin-leaved grasses, distributed through the tropics and here and there in the temperate zone—one, A. (Chrysopogon) nutans, the Indian grass or wood-grass, in the southern United States. The last is widely distributed in many forms; it is a nutritious grass, 6 feet high, with a graceful panicle, sometimes named wild oats. The one important species is A. Sorghum (Sorghum vulgare, etc.), a polymorphous much-cultivated species, of which some varieties have been regarded as distinct.
Bakel divides it into the subspecies—(a) Halepense, including with other varieties the ornamental Aleppo grass and the Johnson or Means grass cultivated in the southern United States, and (b) nutans, which includes the broom-corn (var. technicus), the sorghum (var. saccharatus; see def. 1), the durra (vars. cernuus and Durra), the so-called Indian or African millet (covering perhaps the last and the var. vulgare), and the guinea-corn or Kafir-corn, if it is different from the durra. The Johnson grass is of considerable utility as fodder, but is difficult to extricate; also called Egyptian, Cuban, or Guinea grass, Australian or Morocco millet, etc., and sorghum. The durra has been somewhat cultivated in the United States, some forms of it being called Milto unize. See broom-corn, durra, and Indian millet (under millet).

Sorghum (Andropogon Sorghum).
1, wild form; 2, panicle of same; a, spikelets of cultivated form.

sorgo (sôr'gô), n. Same as sorghum.

sori, n. Plural of sorus.

Sorioidæ (sô-ris'i-dô), n. pl. [NL., < Sorex (Soric-) + -idæ.] A family of small insectivorous mammals, the shrews. They are of terrestrial, sometimes natorial, habits, with a long and narrow skull without zygomatic arches or postorbital processes, anterior tympanic bones, no symphysis pubis, the fore limbs not specially modified as in the moles, the tibia and fibula united, and the lower teeth 12 (in one genus 12 or 14). The lower incisors are long, proclivous, and usually notched; in the upper teeth the median incisors are large, and have a basal snag or cusp, appearing as if double (but see soricident); no canines are specialized, and the premolars are variable; the molars are large and multicuspitate. The total number of the teeth varies from twenty-six to thirty-two. The family is well marked, with little range of variation, though the species are so numerous. The shrews are all small animals, some being the smallest known mammals, and have the general appearance of mice, though with more pointed snout. The rather numerous (about 12) genera fall in two groups or subfamilies, Soricinae and Crocidurinae.

soricident (sō-ris'i-dent), a. [L. sorex (sorice-), a shrew, + dent (-s) = E. tooth.] Having or noting a dentition like that of shrews. This dentition is unique in some respects. It consists of the four kinds of teeth usual among diphyodont mammals, but no canines are specialized as such, and the median pair of incisors both above and below are remarkable in presenting two or more cusps, besides being of great size. These peculiarities, together with the speedy and complete obliteration of the maxillo-premaxillary suture, have caused the median incisors alone to be so named, and have occasioned great uncertainty in the dental formulae of the several genera of shrews. Determination of the position of the suture has shown, however, that several other pairs of teeth besides the specialized median upper pair are inserted in the premaxillary, and are therefore incisors; that the foremost pair of maxillary teeth (technically canines) are never specialized, and always small, and that these are followed by one or two pairs of premolars, constantly succeeded by three pairs of true molars. The constancy in number of the under teeth (twelve, with some anomalous exceptions) is also remarkable, and the total variation is only from twenty-six to thirty-two among all the genera. The eight upper incisors of several genera are a number unique among placental mammals; and the soricident dentition is, on the whole, in proportion to the size of the animals, the most formidable known among mammals, of greater relative power than that of any carnivore. See Soricidae.

Soricident Teeth of Common Shrew (Sorex araneus), enlarged seven times. i1, large two-pronged anterior upper incisor; i2, i3, i4, succeeding upper incisors, to mpx, line of obliterated maxillo-premaxillary suture; c, first maxillary tooth, technically a canine, unspecialized and resembling the preceding incisor; pm1, minute first premolar; pm2, large second premolar. In the lower jaw, i1, very large serrated anterior incisor; i2, i3, i4, following teeth to the one opposite pm2; other teeth omitted.

Soricinae (sor-i-si'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Sorex (Sorice-) + -inae.] The typical subfamily of Soricidae, containing those shrews of both the Old and the New World which have the teeth brown or red: contrasted with Crocidurinae. The genera usually admitted are Sorex, Neosorex, Notiosorex, Soriculus, Blarina, and Crossopus. See Sorex, and cuts under Blarina, shrew, and Soricidae.

soricine (sor'i-sin), a. [L. soricinus, of or belonging to a shrew, < sorex (sorice-), shrew: see Sorex.] Resembling or related to a shrew or shrew-mouse; of or pertaining to the Soricinae or Soricidae; soricoid in a narrow sense.—Soricine bat, Glossophaga soricina, a small South American species of bat.

soricoid (sor'i-koid), a. and n. [L. sorex (sorice-), shrew, + -oid.] I. a. Soricine in the broadest sense; of or pertaining to the Soricidae.

II. n. A member of the Soricoidae, as a shrew, shrew-mole, or mole.

Soricoidea (sor-i-koi'dē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Sorex (Sorice-) + -oidea.] A superfamily of mammals of the order Insectivora, containing the two families Soricidae and Tapidae, the shrews and the moles.

soriferous (sō-rif'e-rus), a. [Gr. σῶρος, a heap, + φέρω = E. bear.] In bot., bearing sori.

sorites (sō-rī-tēz), n.; pl. sorites. [NL., < L. sorites, < Gr. σωρίτης, σωρίτης, a logical sophism formed by an accumulation of arguments, lit. 'heaper,' < σωρεύω, heap, < σῶρος, a heap. In def. 2 first used by Laurentius Valla (died 1457).] 1. A kind of sophism invented by Chrysippus in the third century before Christ, by which a person is led by gradual steps from maintaining what is manifestly true to admitting what is manifestly false. For example: One grain of sand cannot make a heap; then, if one grain be added to a grain, the one added grain cannot make that a heap which was not a heap before; and so on, until it is shown that a million or more grains of sand cannot make a heap.

2. A chain-syllogism, or argument having a number of premises and one conclusion, the argumentation being capable of analysis into a number of syllogisms, the conclusion of each of which is a premise of the next. A sorites may be categorical or hypothetical, like a syllogism, and either variety may be progressive or regressive.—Progressive or Aristotelian sorites. See Aristotelian.—Regressive or Goclenian sorites. See Goclenian.

soritical (sō-rī-tī-kal), a. [LL. soriticus, < Gr. σωρίτικος, < σωρίτης, σωρίτης, a sorites.] Pertaining to or resembling a sorites.

sormount, v. An obsolete variant of surmount.
sorn (sōrn), v. i. [Said to be contr. < ME. sojourn, sojourn, sojourn. Cf. sorehon.] To obtrude one's self on another for bed and board; be an uninvited and unwelcome guest; sponge. [Scotch.]

Lang-legged Highland gillies that will neither work nor want, and maun gang thiggng and sornng about on their acquaintance. Scott, Rob Roy, xxvi.

sornar (sōr'nār), n. Same as sorner.

sorner (sōr'nēr), n. [Gr. σῶρ + -er; ult. a contraction of sojourner.] One who sorns; one who obtrudes himself on another for bed and board; in Scots law, one who takes lodging and food from others by force or menaces without paying for it. This offense was formerly so prevalent in Scotland that the severest penalties were enacted against it, and at one period it was punishable with death.

sorophore (sō-rō-fōr), n. [*NL. *sorophorum*, neut. of **sorophorus*: see sorophorous.] In bot., the mucilaginous cord or cushion which is emitted from the germinating sporocarp in Marsilea, and which bears the sori arranged in two rows. See cut under Marsilea.

sorophorous (sō-rof'ō-rus), a. [Gr. σωρός, a heap, + -φορος, < φέρω = E. bear.] Bearing sori.

sororal (sō-rō-ral), a. [L. soror, sister (= E. sister), + -al.] Of or pertaining to a sister or sisters; sisterly.

The sororal relation. II. Mann.

sororially (sō-rō-rī-āl-i), a. [**sororally* for sororal + -ly.] In a sisterly manner. [Rare.]

"This way then, my dear sister," cried Jane to the newcomer, and, taking her sororally by the hand, she led her forth from the oak parlour. T. Hook, The Sutherlands. (Davies.)

sororicide (sō-ror'i-sid), n. [L. sororicida, < soror, a sister, + -cida, < cædere, kill.] One who kills his sister. Blount, Glossographia.

soricide (sō-ror'i-sid), n. [LL. sororicidium, < L. soror, sister, + -cidium, < cædere, kill.] The murder of a sister. Bailey, 1727.

sororize (sō-rō-rīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. sororized, ppr. sororizing. [L. soror, sister, + -ize: simulating fraternize.] To associate as sisters; be in communion or sympathy as sisters. [Rare.]

The beautiful girls . . . are . . . sororizing with the rustic maidens of their parishes. Mortimer Collins, Thoughts in my Garden, II. 3. (Eneye. [Dict.])

While heaven did daigne the world should him enjoy, The ninefold Sorory themselves exiled, Euen from their native home to art's annoy. Tourneur, Transformed Metamorphosis, st. 68.

sorose (sō-rōs), a. [*NL. *sorosus*, < sorus, q. v.] In bot., bearing sori.

sorosis (sō-rō-sis), n.; pl. soroses (-sēz). [NL., < Gr. σωρός, a heap.] In bot., a fleshy multiple fruit composed of many flowers, seed-vessels, and receptacles consolidated, as in the pineapple, breadfruit, and mulberry.

Sorotrocha (sō-rō-trō-kā), n. pl. [NL. (Ehrenberg), neut. pl. of sorotrochus: see sorotrochous.] An order of Rotifera, containing those wheel-animalcules whose wheel-organ is divided or compound: distinguished from Monotrocha.

sorotrochian (sō-rō-trō-kī-an), a. and n. [Gr. sorotrochus + -ian.] I. a. Sorotrochous; not monotrochous.

II. n. A rotifer whose wheel is compound or divided; any member of the Sorotrocha.

sorotrochous (sō-rō-trō-kus), a. [NL. sorotrochus, < Gr. σωρός, a heap, + τροχός, a wheel, < τρέχω, run.] Having the wheel-organ divided or compound, as a rotifer; not monotrochous.

sorra, n. See sorrow, n., 4.

sorrage, n. See sorage.

sorrance, n. Same as sorance.

sorrel (sor'el), n. [Early mod. E. also sorell, sorel, sorell; < ME. sorel, < OF. sorel, F. surelle (ML. surella), sorrel, so named from its sour taste; with dim. -el, < sur, sour, sharp, < OHG. MHG. sūr, G. sauer, sour: see sour.] Cf. AS. sūr (= MLG. sūr = Icel. sūra = (with dim. suffix) D. zuring), sorrel, < sūr, sour: see sour.] 1. One of several species of the genus Rumex, smaller plants than the docks of the same genus, having the leaves typically halberd-shaped, more or less succulent, and impregnated with oxalic acid. The common sorrel of the Old World is R. acetosa, which has been much cultivated for culinary use. R. scutellatus, the French sorrel, is, however, preferred for the purpose, being more succulent and less acid. Sorrel is much grown in the European continent, especially in France. It is used in salads and soups, but is more commonly dressed as a spinach. The use of sorrel in America is slight but increasing. R. acetosella, sometimes substituted for the foregoing, is the common sheep-sorrel. Both plants are refrigerant and diuretic antiscorbutics. See cut under Rumex.

2. A plant of the genus Oxalis, more properly called wood-sorrel (see cuts under Oxalis and obcordate): the name is also extended to other plants of different genera (see phrases).—Climbing sorrel, Begonia scandens, of tropical America, a somewhat shrubby herb climbing by rootlets. [West Indies.]—Field-sorrel. Same as sheep-sorrel.—Indian sorrel. Same as roselle.—Mountain-sorrel. See Oxyria.—Red sorrel. (a) Same as roselle. (b) The sheep-sorrel: probably from the red male inflorescence.—Salt of sorrel. See salt.—Switch-sorrel, a widely diffused tropical shrub, Dodonaea viscosa, of the Sapindaceae. Its leaves have an acid and bitter taste.—Water-sorrel. Same as water-dock. (See also horse-sorrel.)

Sorrel (sor'el), a. and n. [Early mod. E. sorrell, sorell, sorel; < *OF. *sorrel*, sorell, surrel, dim. of sor, F. saur, saure, brown, reddish, brownish, sorel: see sore.] I. a. Of a yellowish-or reddish-brown color.

Saure, a sorrell colour, also a sorrell horse. Colgrave.

He is of a middle stature, strong sett, high coloured, a head of sorrell haire, a severe and sound judgement; a good fellow. Aubrey, Lives (Samuel Butler).

II. n. 1. A color between a reddish and a yellowish brown.

Sorrell, colour of an horse, sorrell. Palegrave, p. 272. His horse was of fiery sorrell, with black feet. Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iii.

2. An animal of a sorrel color; especially, a sorrel horse.

Till he falls from his seat, the coache orethrowes, And to the riders breeds a world of woes; Noe holla Jacke, nor Sorrell, holla boye, Will make them stay till they even all destroy. The Newe Metamorphosis (1600). (Nares.)

Is the Coach gone? Saddle my Horse the sorrell. Dekker, Honest Whore, II. 1.

3. A buck of the third year. Compare sore, n., 2. A Bucke the first yeare is a Fawne; the second yeare a Pricket; the third yeare a Sorrel.

Return from Parnassus (1606), II. 5. The dogs did yell: put I to sore, then sorel jumps from thicket. Shak., L. L. L., iv. 2. 60.

sorrel-sopst (sor'el-sops), n. pl. A term used in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries for some sort of drink used in fevers.

sorrel-tree (sor'el-trē), n. See Oxydendrum.

sorrel-vine (sor'el-vin), n. A shrub, Cissus (Vitis) acida, found in tropical America, reaching into Florida. It is a low tendril-bearing climber, with acid juice.

sorri (sor'i-li), adv. [ME. sorlyly, sorili, soriliche, sariliche, sarili; < sorry + -ly.] In a sorry manner, in any sense of the word; sorrowfully; sadly; wretchedly; poorly; meanly.

sorriness (sor'i-nēs), n. [ME. sorinesse, sorinisse, sorynesce, sarinesce, < AS. sārignes, < sārīg, sore, sorry: see sorry and -ness.] The state or feeling of being sorry, in any sense.

sorrow (sor'ō), n. [ME. sorow, sorowe, sorwe, sorewe, scorwe, scorwe, sorize, sorege, soreghe, sorge, < AS. sorg, sorh, sorge = OS. sarga, sorga = MD. sorg, D. corg = MLG. LG. sorge, care, anxiety, = OHG. sarga, MHG. G. sorge = Icel. Sw. Dan. sorg, care, = Goth. sairga, care, grief; cf. Lith. sirgti, be ill, suffer. Not connected etymologically with sorel or sorry.] 1. Distress of mind caused by misfortune, injury, loss, disappointment, or the like; grief; misery; sadness; regret.

Give sorrow words; the grief that does not speak Whispers the o'er-fraught heart, and bids it break. Shak., Macbeth, iv. 3. 200.

Sorrow is uneasiness in the mind upon the thought of a good lost which might have been enjoyed longer, or the sense of a present evil. Locke, Human Understanding, II. xx. 8.

2. A cause or occasion of grief; a painful fact, event, or situation; a misfortune; a trouble.

And howe he lost that comfort clene, And was putte oute for parady, And sithen what sorow sor warre scene Sento vn-to hym and to al his. York Plays, p. 93.

God so willed; Mankind is ignorant, a man am I; Call ignorance my sorrow, not my sin! Browning, Ring and Book, II. 175.

3. The outward manifestation of grief; mourning; lamentation. Down his white beard a stream of sorrow flows. Pope, Iliad, ix. 550.

Nor sound of human sorrow mounts to mar
Their sacred everlasting calm Tennyson, Lucretina.

4. The devil: used generally as an expletive in imprecation, often implying negation. Compare devil, n., 7. Sometimes the muckle sorrow. Also spelled sorra. [Scotch and Irish.]

Quhen he had jumlit a full lang houre,
The sorrow crap of butter he gatt.
H'uf of Auchtermuchty (Child's Ballads, VIII. 110).

soteriological (sō-tē'ri-ō-lōj'i-kal), a. [< soteriology + -ic.] Of or pertaining to soteriology; specifically, pertaining to the doctrine of spiritual salvation through Jesus Christ.

He [Paul] elaborated the fullest scheme of Christian doctrine which we possess from apostolic pens. It is essentially soteriological, or a system of the way of salvation. Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, I. § 71.

soteriology (sō-tē'ri-ō-lōj'i-jī), n. [< Gr. σωτήριος, saving (< σώω, to deliver, a preserver, < σώω, save), + -λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] 1. A discourse on health; the art of promoting and preserving health; hygiene.—2. That branch of theology which treats of the salvation of men through Jesus Christ.

While the doctrines of Theology and Anthropology received a considerably full development during the Patristic and Scholastic periods, it was reserved for the Protestant church, and the modern theological mind, to bring the doctrines of Soteriology to a correspondent degree of expansion. H. G. T. Shedd, Hist. Christ. Doctrine, II. v. 1.

sothi, a. and n. A Middle English form of sooth.

sottishness (sot'ish-ness), n. The state or character of being sottish. (a) Stupidity; dullness; foolishness.

The King [of Britain], both for his Wives sake and his own sottishness, consulting also with his Peers not unlike himself, readily yields. Milton, Hist. Eng., III.

(b) Stupidity from intoxication; drunken habits generally.

No sober, temperate person can look with any complacency upon the drunkenness and sottishness of his neighbour. South.

sotto (sot'tō), prep. [It., < L. subter, under, beneath, < sub, under: see sub-.] Under; below: an Italian word occurring in a few phrases: as, sotto il soggetto, below the subject; sotto voce, under the voice, in an undertone, aside.

sot-weed (sot'wēd), n. Tobacco. [Rare.]

I scarce had fill'd a pipe of sot-weed,
And by the candle made it hot-weed.
Hudibras Redivivus. (Nares.)

We had every one ramm'd a full charge of sot-weed into our infernal guns. Tom Brown, Works, II. 100.

sotyl, a. A Middle English form of subtle.

Gr. ψυχή, etc.); origin unknown.* The word has been compared with Gr. αἶσλος, quick-moving, changeable, and with sea (see sea<sup>1</sup>); also with L. sæculum, age (life, vitality ?) (see secl, secular).] 1. A substantial entity believed to be that in each person which lives, feels, thinks, and wills.

Animals also, and even plants, have been thought to have souls. Primitive peoples identify the soul with the breath, or something contained in the blood. Separated from the body, it is supposed to have some imperfect existence, and to retain the form of the body as a ghost. The verses of Dawes (see below) enumerate most of the ancient Greek opinions. The first is that of Anaximander and of Diogenes of Apollonia; the second is that of Heraclitus; the third is that of Empedocles; the fourth is that attributed to Empedocles by Aristotle; the fifth is that of Democritus and other Pythagoreans, as Simplicius in the "Phædo"; the sixth is attributed wrongly to Galen; the seventh is that of Democritus and the atomists; the eighth is attributed by some authorities to the Pythagoreans; and the ninth is that of the Stoics. Aristotle makes the soul little more than a faculty or attribute of the body, and he compares it to the "axness" of an ax. The scholastics combined this idea with that of the separability and immortality of the soul, thus forming a highly metaphysical doctrine. Descartes originated distinct metaphysical dualism, which holds that spirit and matter are two radically different kinds of substance—the former characterized by consciousness, the latter by extension. Most modern philosophers hold to monism in some form, which recognizes only one kind of substance. That the soul is immortal is a very ancient and widely diffused opinion; it is also commonly believed that the soul has no parts. A soul separated from the body is commonly called a spirit, not a soul. In biblical and theological usage 'soul' (nephesh, psyche, also rendered life) is sometimes used for the non-corporeal nature of man in general, and sometimes, in distinction from spirit, for the lower part of this non-corporeal nature, standing in direct communication with the body, and regarded as the seat of the emotions, rarely of will or spirit. Some theologians minimize the distinction between soul and spirit, making them mere aspects or relations of the same substance, while others have made them distinct substances or distinct entities.

For of the soule the bodie forme doth take;

For soule is forme, and doth the bodie make.

Spenser, Hymn in Honour of Beauty, I. 132.

I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

1 Thes. v. 23.

The word of God is . . . sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit.

Heb. iv. 12.

To hold opinion with Pythagoras

That souls of animals infuse themselves

Into the trunks of men. Shak., M. of V., iv. I. 132.

One thinks the soule is aire; another fire;

Another blood, diffus'd about the heart;

Another saith the elements conspire,

And to her essence each doth give a part.

Musicians thinke our soules are harmonies;

Philisians hold that they complexions be;

Epicures make them swarves of atomies,

Which doe by chance into our bodies flee.

Some think one generall soule fills every braine,

As the bright sunne sheds light in every starre;

And others thinke the name of soule is vaine,

And that we onely well-mixt bodies are.

Sir J. Davies, Nosce Teipsum.

They [corporations] cannot commit treason, nor be outlawed, nor excommunicate, for they have no souls.

Case of Sutton's Hospital, 10 Coke's Rep., p. 32, b.

Although the human soul is united to the whole body, it has, nevertheless, its principal seat in the brain, where alone it not only understands and imagines, but also perceives. Descartes, Prin. of Philos. (tr. by Veitch), iv. § 180.

Our idea of soul, as an immaterial spirit, is of a substance that thinks and has a power of exciting motion in body by writing or thought.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxlii. § 22.

With chemic art exalts the mineral powers,
 And draws the aromatic soules of flowers.

Pope, Windsor Forest, I. 244.

It seems probable that the soul will remain in a state of inactivity, though perhaps not of insensibility, from death to the resurrection.

Hartley, Observations on Man, II. iv. § 3, prop. 60.

2. The moral and emotional part of man's nature; the seat of the sentiments or feelings; in distinction from intellect.

Hear my soul speak:

The very instant that I saw you, did

My heart fly to your service.

Shak., Tempest, III. I. 63.

These vain joys, in which their wills consume
 Such powers of wit and soul as are of force
 To raise their beings to eternity.

B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, v. 2.

In my soul I loathe

All affectation. Cowper, Task, II. 416.

3. The animating or essential part; the essence: as, the soul of a song; the source of action; the chief part; hence, the inspirer or leader of any action or movement: as, the soul of an enterprise; an able commander is the soul of an army.

Brevity is the soul of wit,

And tediousness the limbs and outward flourishes.

Shak., Hamlet, II. 2. 90.

He had put domestic factions under his feet; he was the soul of a mighty coalition.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., VII.

4. Fervor; fire; grandeur of mind, or other noble manifestation of the heart or moral nature.

I have been woo'd by many with no less

Soul of affection.

Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess, IV. 4.

Money gives soul to action. Forb., Perkin Warbeck, III. 1.

There is some soul of goodness in things evil.

Shak., Hen. V., IV. I. 4.

5. A spiritual being; a disembodied spirit; a shado.

Then of his wretched friend

The Soul appear'd; at ev'ry part the form did comprehend His likeness; his fair eyes, his voice, his stature, ev'ry weed

His person wore, it fantasied. Chapman, Iliad, xxiii. I. 53.

O sacred essence, other form,

O solemn ghost, O crowned soul!

Tennyson, In Memoriam, lxxxv.

6. A human being; a person.

All the souls of the house of Jacob, which came into Egypt, were threescore and ten.

Gen. xlv. 27.

My lord, this is a poor mad soul; . . . and the truth is, poverty hath distracted her.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., II. I. 113.

Humph. Where had you this intelligence?

Tom. From a foolish fond soul that can keep nothing from me.

Steele, Conscious Lovers, I. 1.

All Souls' day, in the Rom. Cath. Ch., the 2d of November, a day kept in commemoration of all the faithful departed, for this eternal repose of their souls, to which end the mass and offices of the day are directed. It is the day following the feast of All Saints.—Apparitional soul. See apparitional.—Commendation of the soul. See commendation, 5.—Cure of souls. See cure.—Descent of souls. See descent.—Seat of the soul, the part of the body (according to some speculators a mathematical point) in immediate dynamic connection with the soul.

As long as the soul was supposed to be a material thing (which was the usual ancient opinion), it was naturally held to have a distinct place. Later the knowledge of the functions of the nervous system, and their centralization in the brain, showed that the soul was more intimately connected with that than with other parts of the body; and it was vaguely supposed that the unity of consciousness would in some measure be explained by the hypothesis of a special seat of the soul in the brain. The commonest primitive notion was that the soul was resident in the blood or in the heart. Either the whole soul or its parts were also located in the bowels, bones, liver, gall, kidneys, and other organs. The doctrine that the soul is in the brain seems to have originated in Egypt, and found many partial adherents in antiquity, but was not generally accepted before modern times. The Neoplatonists held that the soul is wholly in the whole body and wholly in every part. Descartes placed the soul in the pineal gland, and other physiologists of the seventeenth century located it in different organs connected with the brain. Leibnitz introduced the theory that it resides at a mathematical point, which has found eminent supporters, some of whom regard this point as movable. Others hold that any conception of consciousness which forces its adherents to such a conclusion ought to be considered as reduced to an absurdity. Recent observations concerning multiple consciousness strengthen indications previously known that the unity of consciousness is somewhat illusory; and the anatomy of the brain does not support the notion of an absolute centralization of the power of forming ideas.—Sentient soul, the soul as affected by the senses, or as possessing sentience.—Syn. 1 and 2. Intellect, Spirit, etc. See mind.—4. Ardo, force.

The gost that fro the fader gan procede

A certain soullessness and absence of ennobling ideals in the national character. The Academy, No. 876, p. 109.

soul-mass (sōl'mās), n. A mass for the dead.

soul-massing (sōl'mās'ing), n. The saying of masses for the dead.

So doth it cast down all their soul-massing and foolish foundations for such as be dead and past the ministry of God's word.

J. Bradford, Works (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 278.

soul-paper (sōl'pā'pēr), n. A paper or parchment bearing an inscription soliciting prayers for the soul of some departed person or persons. Soul-papers were given away with soul-cakes on All Souls' day.

soul-penny (sōl'pen'i), n. An offering toward the expenso of saying masses for the souls of the departed.

The Dean shall have, for collecting the soul-pennies from the bretheren, on the first day, i. e. out of the goods of the gild.
English Gilds (E. T. S.), p. 181.

soul-scot (sōl'skot), n. [Prop. soul-scat, repr. AS. sūwel-scat, sūwel-scat, money paid at the open grave for the repose of the soul, < sūwel, soul, + scat, money; see soul and scat], and cf. *scot*², *shot*².] In old eccles. law, a funeral payment, formerly made at the grave, usually to the parish priest in whose church service for the departed had been said; a mortuary. Also soul-shot.

On each side of this bier kneeled three priests, who told their beads and muttered their prayers with the greatest signs of external devotion. For this service a splendid soul-scat was paid to the convent of Saint Edmund's by the mother of the deceased.
Scott, Ivanhoe, xlii.

Those among the dead man's friends and kinsfolks who wished had come and brought the soul-shot, as their gift at the offertory of that holy sacrifice.
Lock, Church of our Fathers, II. 306.

soul-shot (sōl'shot), n. See soul-scot.

soul-sick (sōl'sik), a. Diseased or distressed in mind or soul; morally diseased. [Rare.]

I am soul-sick,
And wither with the fear of one condemn'd,
Till I have got your pardon.
Bean, and Fl., Maid's Tragedy, iv. 1.

soul-silver, n. [ME. soulf + silver.] The whole or a part of the wages of a retainer or servant, originally paid in food, but afterward commuted into a money payment. Halliwel.

soul-sleeper (sōl'slō'pēr), n. Same as psychopannychist.

soul-stuff (sōl'stuf), n. The hypothetical substance of the soul; psychoplasma. See mind-stuff.

soul-vexed (sōl'vekst), a. Disturbed or distressed in spirit. Shak., W. T., v. 1. 59.

soum, sowm (soum), n. [A var. of *sum*², amount, proportion; see *sum*².] The proportion of cattle or sheep suitable to any pasture, or vice versa: as, a soum of sheep, as many sheep as a certain amount of pasturage will support; a soum of grass or land, as much as will pasture one cow or five sheep. [Scotch.]

soum, sowm (soum), v. i. [ME. soum, sowm, n.] To enucleate and determine what number of cattle or sheep a certain piece of land will support. [Scotch.]—Soum and roum, to pasture (in summer) and fodder (in winter). Jamieson.—Souming and rouming, in Scots law, the action whereby the number of cattle to be brought upon a common by the persons respectively having a servitude of pasturage may be ascertained. The criterion is the number of cattle which each of the dominant proprietors is able to fodder during winter. Strictly speaking, to soum a common is to ascertain the several soums it may hold, and to roum it is to portion it out among the dominant proprietors.

soun, v. An obsolete variant of seem.

soun², n. and v. An original spelling of *sound*². sound¹ (sound), a. and n. [ME. sound, sond, suud, isund, < AS. gesund (= OS. gesund = OFries. sund, sond = MD. gesund, D. gezond = MLG. gesunt, LG. gesund, sund = OHG. gisunt, MHG. gesunt, G. gesund = Sw. Dan. sund), sound; < ge-, a collective and generalizing prefix (see i-), + **sund*, of uncertain origin, perhaps akin to L. sanus, whole, sound: see *sane*¹.] I. a. 1. Healthy; not diseased; having all the organs and faculties complete and in perfect action: as, a sound mind; a sound body.

If horn child is hol and sund,
And Athulf bithate [without] wund.
King Horn (E. T. S.), p. 38.

Though he falle, he falleth not hote as he falle in a hote, sound¹ (sound), v. [ME. sounden; < *sound*¹, a.] I. trans. To heal; make sound.

Further wol I never foundo
Non other help, my sores for to sounde.
Chaucer, Anelida and Arleite, l. 242.

II. intrans. To become sound; heal.

Thro girl with mony a wounde,
That lykly never for to sounde.
Lydgate, Complaint of the Black Knight, l. 292.

sound¹ (sound), adv. [*ME. sound*¹, a.] Soundly; heartily; thoroughly; deeply: now used only of sleeping.

So sound he slept that nought mought him awake.
Spenser, F. Q., i. i. 42.

Till he tell the truth,

sound<sup>3</sup> (sound), n. [< ME. sounde; cf. Icel. sundmagi, the sound of a fish, lit. 'swimming-maw': see sound<sup>2</sup> and maw<sup>1</sup>.] In zool.: (a) The swimming-bladder or air-bladder of a fish. The sound is a hollow vesicular organ, originating from the digestive tract—in fact, a rudimentary lung, the actual homologue of the lungs of air-breathing vertebrates, though in fishes, as in other branchiata, respiration is effected by gills. (See air-bladder.) Some fishes' sounds are an esteemed article of food, as that of the cod, which when fried is something like an oyster so cooked; others are valuable as a source of isinglass.

Sounde of a fyssh, cannon. Palsgrave. (Halliwell.)
Of [fishes'] sounds we make isinglass.
Goldsmith, Int. to Brooke's Nat. Hist., III.

(b) A cuttlefish.

To measure the depth of; fathom; try or test, as the depth of water and the quality of the ground, by sinking a plummet or lead attached to a line on which is marked the number of fathoms. Machines of various kinds are also used to indicate the depth to which the lead has descended. A cavity in the lower end of the lead is partially filled with* Apparatus used in Sounding.

A, B, C, Brooke's Deep-sea Sounding-apparatus: a, rod with horns b pivoted thereto; c, sounding-line; d, wires by which the lead e is attached to the horns, connected with a washer f under the lead; h, opening in lower end of rod, by which specimens of the bottom may be secured. When the rod strikes the bottom, the lead slides downward, bringing the horns into the position shown in B, and releasing the wires a and the lead; the rod only is then drawn up, leaving the lead at the bottom.
D, E, British Navy Sounding-apparatus: a, lead; b, counterpoised hooks which engage the loop at the top of the lead; c, wedge-shaped cup for specimens, attached by cord or wire to the pivot of the hooks; d, attachment for the sounding line or wire. When the cup touches bottom, the hooks d drop into the position shown in E; the sinker or lead then drops over, releasing the cup, and this, with its specimen and the hooks, is drawn to the surface.

tallow, by means of which some part of the earth, sand, gravel, shells, etc., of the bottom adhere to it and are drawn up. Numerous devices are in use for testing the nature of the bottom, as a pair of large forceps or scoops carried down by a weight, which are closed when they

a and b, arms pivoted to c; d, lead, which is attached to a stem at the top of which is a crosspiece. When the arms are raised into the position shown in A, the crosspiece engages them and holds them in that position till the lead strikes the bottom; they are then released, and fall into the position shown in B. The cups (shown in the cuts), on closing, scoop up a specimen of the bottom.

strike the ground, and so inclose some of the sand, shells, etc., a cup at the bottom of a long leaden weight, which is closed by a leather cover when full, etc. See the accompanying cuts of apparatus used in sounding. Brooke's apparatus is said to be the first by which soundings of over 2,000 fathoms were made and specimens of the bottom obtained.

Go sound the ocean, and cast your nets;
Happily you may catch her in the sea.
Shak., Tit. And., iv. 3. 7.

Two plummets dropt for one to sound the abyss.
Tennyson, Princess, li.

2. In surg., to examine by means of a sound or probe, especially the bladder, in order to ascertain whether a stone is present or not.

By a precious oyle Doctor Russell at the first applyed to it when he sounded it with probe (ere night) his tormenting paine was . . . well inswaged.
Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 170.

3. Figuratively, to try; examine; discover, or endeavor to discover, that which is concealed in the mind of; search out the intention, opinion, will, or wish of.

It is better to sound a person with whom one deals, afar off, than to fall upon the point at first, except you mean to surprise him by some short question.
Bacon, Negotiating (ed. 1887).

I have sounded him already at a distance, and find all his answers exactly to our wish.
Goldsmith, Good-natured Man, ii.

4. To ascertain the depth of (water) in a ship's hold by lowering a sounding-rod into the pump-well.—5. To make a sounding with, or carry down in sounding, as a whale the tow-line of a boat.—To sound a line, to sound all lines. See line<sup>2</sup>. II. intrans. 1. To use the line and lead in searching the depth of water.

1 sounded, as a schyppeman soundedeth in the see with his plummet to knowe the deppeth of the see. Je pilote. Palsgrave, p. 226.

The shipmen . . . sounded, and found it twenty fathoms.
Acts xxvii. 27, 28.

2. To penetrate to the bottom; reach the depth.

For certes, lord, so sore hath she me wounded
That stood in blake, with lokinge of hire eighen,
That to myn hertis botme it is sounded.
Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 535.

3. To descend to the bottom; dive: said of fish and other marine animals. When a sperm-whale sounds, the fore parts are lifted a little out of water, a strong spout is given, the nose is dipped, the back and small are rounded up, the body bends on a cross-axis, the flukes are thrown up 20 or 30 feet, and the whale goes straight down head first, in less than its own length of water.

sound<sup>4</sup> (sound), n. [= D. G. Dan. sonde = Sw. sond, < F. sonde, a probe, a sounding-lead, = Sp. Pg. sonda, a sound; from the verb: see sound<sup>4</sup>, v.] In surg., any elongated instrument, usually metallic, by which cavities of the body are sounded or explored; a probe; specifically, an instrument used for exploring or dilating the urethra, or for searching the bladder for stone.

sound<sup>5</sup> (sound), n. [< ME. souwde (with ox-crescent d), sonn, sown, souwde, son, *< OF. sonn, son, sun, F. son = Pr. son, so = Sp. son = Pg. som = It. suono = Icel. sönn, a sound, < L. sonus, a sound; cf. Skt. svana, sound, < svan, sound. Cf. sound<sup>6</sup>, v., and see assonant, consonant, dissonant, resonant, person, parson, resonant, sonata, sonnet, sonorous, sonant, unison, etc.] 1. The sensation produced through the ear, or organ of hearing; in the physical sense, either the vibrations of the sounding-body itself, or those of the air or other medium, which are caused by the sounding-body, and which immediately affect the ear. A musical sound, or tone, is produced by a continued and regular series of vibrations (or, in the physical sense, may be said to be these vibrations themselves); while a noise is caused either by a single impulse, as an electrical spark, or by a series of impulses following at irregular intervals. A sounding-body is a body which is in such a state of vibration as to produce a sound (see vibration). Thus, a tuning-fork, a bell, or a piano-string, if struck, will, in consequence of its elasticity, continue to vibrate for some time, producing, in the proper medium, a sound; similarly, the column of air in an organ-pipe becomes a sounding-body when a current of air is continually forced through the mouthpiece past the lip; again, an inelastic body, as a eard, may become a sounding-body if it receives a series of blows at regular intervals and in sufficiently rapid succession, as from the teeth of a revolving cog-wheel. The vibrations of the sounding-body are conveyed to the ear by the intervening medium, which is usually the air, but may be any other gas, a liquid (as water), or an elastic solid. The presence of such a medium is essential, for sound is not propagated in a vacuum. The vibrations of the sounding-body, as a tuning-fork, produce in the medium a series of waves (see wave) of condensation and rarefaction, which are propagated in all directions with a velocity depending upon the nature of the medium and its temperature—for example, the velocity of sound in air is about 1,090 feet per second at 32° F. (0° C.), and increases slightly as the temperature rises; in other gases the velocity varies inversely as the square root of the density; it is consequently nearly four times as great in hydrogen. In liquids the velocity is greater than in air—for water, somewhat more than four times as great. In solids the velocity varies very widely, being relatively small in inelastic substances like wax and lead, and very great (two to three miles per second) in wood and steel. Sound-waves may differ (1) in their wavelength—that is, in the number of vibrations per second; (2) in the amplitude of the motion of the particles forming them; and (3) in their form, as to whether they are simple, and consist of a single series of pendulum-like vibrations, or are compound, and formed of several such series superimposed upon each other. Corresponding to these differences in the sound-waves, the sounds perceived by the ear differ in three ways: (1) They differ in pitch. If the sound-waves are long and the number of vibrations few per second, the pitch is said to be low and the sound is called grave; as the number of vibrations increases, the pitch is said to rise and the sound to be higher; if the number of vibrations is very great and the length of the waves correspondingly small, the sound becomes shrill and piercing. It is found that the vibrations must be as numerous as 24 per second in order that the ear may be able to unite them as a continuous sound. Similarly, if the vibrations exceed 30,000 to 40,000 per second, they* cease to produce any sensation upon the ear. (2) Sounds differ in intensity or loudness. Primarily the intensity of the sound depends upon the amplitude of the vibrations; it diminishes with the square of the distance from the sounding-body; it also diminishes as the density of the air or other medium decreases, and is increased by the proximity of a sonorous body which can vibrate in unison with it. (3) Sounds differ in quality or timbre, that property by which we distinguish between the same tone as sounded upon two different musical instruments, as a piano and a violin. This difference is due to the fact that a note produced by a musical instrument is in general a compound note, consisting of the fundamental note, the pitch of which the ear perceives, and with it a number of higher notes of small intensity whose vibrations as compared with the fundamental note are usually as the numbers 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, etc. These upper notes, harmonics or over-tones (see harmonic), blend with the fundamental note, and upon their number and relative intensity, consequently, the resultant combined effect upon the ear, or the quality of the note, depends. Sound-waves may, like light-waves, be reflected from an opposing surface (see reflection, echo, resonance); they may be refracted, or suffer a change of direction, in passing from one medium to another of different density; they may suffer diffraction; and they may also suffer interference, giving rise to the pulsations of sounds called beats. See beat<sup>1</sup>, 7.

2. A particular quality or character of tone, producing a certain effect on the hearer, or suggesting a particular cause; tone; note: as, a joyful sound; a sound of woe.

There is a sound of abundance of rain. 1 Ki. xviii. 41.

Doug. That's the worst tidings that I hear of yet.
Wor. Ay, by my faith, that bears a frosty sound.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., iv. 1. 128.

The sound of a sea without wind is about them.
Swinburne, Hesperia.

3. Vocal utterance.

'Tis not enough no harshness gives offence,
The sound must seem an echo to the sense.
Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 365.

4. Hearing-distance; ear-shot.

Sooner shall grass in Hyde-park Circus grow,
And wits take lodgings in the sound of Bow.
Pope, R. of the L., iv. 118.

5. Empty and unmeaning noise.

A tale
Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, Signifying nothing.
Shak., Macbeth, v. 5. 27.

6. Same as signal, 2.—Anacampsis sounds. See anacampsis.—Blood-sounds, in auscultation, muffled murmurs.—Bronchial sound, the normal bronchial breathing-sound.—Cardiac sounds, the heart-sounds.—Characteristic sound. See characteristic letter, under characteristic.—Cogged breath-sound. See breath-sound.—Friction sound. See friction-sound.—Refraction of sound. See refraction.—Respiratory sounds. See respiratory.—To read by sound, in telegraph. See read<sup>1</sup>.—Syn. 1. Noise, Sound, Tone. Noise is that effect upon the ears which does not convey, and is not meant to convey, any meaning; as, the noise made by a falling chimney; street noises. Sound is a general word, covering noise and intelligible impressions upon the auditory nerves: as, the sound of cannon, of hoofs, of a trumpet, of prayer. Tone is sound regarded as having a definite place on the musical scale, or as modified by feeling or physical affections, or as being the distinctive quality of sound possessed by a person or thing permanently or temporarily: as, his tones were those of anger; a piano of peculiarly rich tone. For technical distinctions, see def. 1 above, noise, and tone.

sound<sup>6</sup> (sound), v. [*< ME. souwden, souwen, souwen, sunen, < OF. suiner, soner, F. sonner = Pr. Sp. sonar = Pg. soar = It. sonare (= Icel. söna), < L. sonare, sound, < sonus, a sound: see sound<sup>5</sup>, n.] I. intrans. 1. To produce vibrations affecting the ear; cause the sensation of sound; make a noise; produce a sound; also, to strike the organs of hearing with a particular effect; produce a specified audible effect: as, the wind sounds melancholy.*

Ther herde I playen on an harpe,
That soundest botle wel and sharpe,
Orpheus ful craftely.
Chaucer, House of Fame, l. 1202.

O earth, that soundest hollow under me.
Tennyson, Coming of Arthur.

2. To cause something (as an instrument) to sound; make music.

The singers sang, and the trumpeters sounded.
2 Chron. xxix. 28.

3. To seem or appear when uttered; appear on narration: as, a statement that sounds like a fiction.

How oddly will it sound that I Must ask my child forgiveness!
Shak., Tempest, v. 1. 197.

All this is mine but till I die:
I can't but think 'twould sound more clever
To me and to my heirs for ever.
Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. vi. 11.

Your father never dropped a syllable which should sound toward the asking me to assist him in his adversity.
Godwin, Fleetwood, xix.

4. To be conveyed in sound; be spread or published.

From you sounded out the word of the Lord.
1 Thes. i. 8.

5. To tend; incline. [Now rare.]

Alle hire wordes moore and lesse, Sounnyng in vertu and in gentillesse.

Chaucer, Physician's Tale, l. 54.

Seyng any thyng sounnyng to treson.

Paston Letters, I. 183.

All such thingis as sounne wyth or ayenst the common welc.

Arnold's Chron., p. 83.

- 6†. To resound.

The shippes herenpon discharge their Ordinance, . . . insomuch that the tops of the hilles sounded therewith.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 245.

To sound in damages, in law, to have as its object the recovery of damages: said of an action brought, not for the recovery of a specific thing, as replevin or an action of debt, but for damages only, as for trespass, etc.

II. trans. 1. To cause to produce sound; set in audible vibration.

A baggepipe wel coude he blowe and sounne.

Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 505.

I have sounded the very base-string of humility.

Shak., 1 Hen. IV., ii. 4. 6.

2. To utter audibly; pronounce; hence, to speak; express; repeat.

But now to yow rehersen ni his speeche,
Or al his woful wordes for to sounne.

Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 573.

Then I, as ono that nm the tongue of these,

To sound the purposes of all their hearts.

Shak., K. John, iv. 2. 48.

The Arab by his desert well

. . . hears his single camel's bell

Sound welcome to his regal quarters.

Whittier, The Maschish.

3. To order or direct by a sound; give a signal for by a certain sound: as, to sound a retreat.

To sound a parley to his heartless foe.

Shak., Lucrece, l. 471.

4. To spread by sound or report; publish or proclaim; celebrate or honor by sounds.

Thou sun, of this great world both eye and soul,

Acknowledge him thy greater; sound his praise.

Milton, P. L., v. 171.

5. To signify; import. [A Latinism.]

Illo resons he spak ful solemnely,

Sounnyng alway thenceres of his wynnynge.

Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 270.

If you have ears that will be pierced—or eyes

That can be opened—a heart that may be touched—

Or any part that yet sounds man about you.

B. Jonson, Volpone, iii. 6.

The cause of divorce mentioned in the law is translated "some uncleanliness," but in Hebrew it sounds "nakedness of night, or any real nakedness."

Milton, Divorce, l.

6. To examine by percussion, as a wall in order to discover hollow places or studding; specifically, in med., to examine by percussion and auscultation, in order to form a diagnosis by means of sounds heard: as, to sound the lungs.

sound<sup>6</sup> (sound). An obsolete or dialectal contracted form of sound, swoon.

soundable (soun'dj-bl), a. [< sound<sup>1</sup> + -able.] Capable of being sounded.

soundboard (soun'dbôrd), n. 1. In musical instruments, a thin resonant plate of wood so placed as to enhance the power and quality of the tones by sympathetic vibration. In the piano-forte it is placed just under or behind the strings; in the pipe-organ it forms the top of the wind-chest in which the pipes are inserted; in the violin, guitar, etc., it is the same as the belly—that is, the front of the body. Great care is exercised in the selection and treatment of the wood for soundboards, which is either pine or spruce-tr. Also sounding-board. See cut under harp.

2. Same as sounding-board, 1. See cut under abat-voix.—Pedal soundboard. See pedal.

sound-boarding (soun'dbôr'ding), n. In carp., short boards which are disposed transversely between the joists, or fixed in a partition for holding the substance called pugging, intended to prevent sound from being transmitted from one part of a house to another.

sound-body, sound-box, sound-chest (soun'd-bod'z, -boks, -chest), n. Same as resonance-box.

sound-bone (soun'dbôn), n. [< sound<sup>3</sup> + bone.] The bone of a fish lying close to the sound or air-bladder. It is a part of the backbone, consisting of those vertebrae collectively which are ordinarily cut out in one piece in splitting the fish.

sound-bow (soun'dbô), n. The thickened edge of a bell against which the clapper strikes. In stating the proportions of a bell, the thickness of the sound-bow is usually taken as a unit.

sound-deafness (soun'def'nes), n. Deafness to sound of every pitch or quality, as distinguished from pitch-deafness and timbre-deafness.

sounder<sup>1</sup> (soun'dér), n. [Early mod. E. also sownder, < ME. soundre, < AS. sunor, a herd.] 1. A herd of wild swine.

That men calleth ntrip of a lame swyn is called of wyldes swyn a soundre: that is to say, 3if ther be passy v. or vi. togedres.

MS. Bodl. 646. (Haltwell.)

Now to speke of the boore, the fyrste year he is

A pygge of the sounder calld, as haue I bys;

The secunde yere an hogge, and soe shall he be,

And an hoggestere when ho is of yeres thre;

And when he is foure yere, a boor shall he be,

From the sounder of the swyne theme departyth he.

Book of St. Alban's (ed. 1496), sig. d., i.

2. A young wild boar: an erroneous use.

It had so happened that a sounder (i. e., in the language of the period, a boar of only two years old) had crossed the track of the proper object of the chase.

Scott, Quentin Durward, ix.

Such then were the pigs of Devon, not to be compared with the true wild descendant, . . . whereof many a sounder still grunted about Swinley down.

Kingsley, Westward Ho, viii.

With this sounding-machine a sounding was made at a depth of 130 fathoms while the steamer was moving at the rate of 16 knots an hour.

sounder<sup>3</sup> (soun'dér), n. [< sound<sup>5</sup> + -er<sup>1</sup>.] That which sounds; specifically, in telegr., a receiving instrument in the use of which the message is read by the sound produced by the armature of the electromagnet in playing back and forth between its stops.

sound-figures (soun'd'fig'nrz), n. pl. Chladni's figures. See nodal lines, under nodal.

sound-hole (soun'd'hôl), n. In musical instruments of the viol and lute classes, an opening in the belly or soundboard, so shaped and placed as to increase its elasticity and thus its capacity for sympathetic vibration. In the modern violin and similar instruments there are two sound-holes, placed on each side of the bridge; they are usually called the f-holes, from their shape.

sounding<sup>1</sup> (soun'ding), n. [< ME. soundyngre, soundyng, soundyngre; verbal n. of sound<sup>1</sup>, v.] 1. The act or process of measuring the depth of anything; exploration, as with a plummet and line, or a sound.—2. The descent of a whale or of a fish to the bottom after being harpooned or hooked.—3. pl. The depth of water in rivers, harbors, along shores, and even in the open seas, which is ascertained in the operation of sounding. The term is also used to signify any place or part of the ocean where a deep sounding-line will reach the bottom; also, the kind of ground or bottom where the line reaches. Soundings on English and American charts are expressed in fathoms, except in some harbor-charts where they are in feet. See deep-sea.—In or on soundings. (a) So near the land that a deep-sea lead will reach the bottom. (b) In comparatively shallow water: said of a whale in the Arctic Ocean, Bering Sea, Sea of Okhotsk, or in bays, lagoons, etc., whose depths may be readily fathomed.—To get on or off soundings, to get into or beyond water where the bottom can be touched by sounding; figuratively, to enter into a subject or topic which one is or is not competent to discuss.—To strike soundings, to find bottom with the deep-sea lead.

sounding<sup>2</sup> (soun'ding), n. [< ME. soundyng; verbal n. of sound<sup>5</sup>, v.] The act of producing a sound or a noise; also, a sound or a noise produced; specifically, in music, compare sound<sup>5</sup>, r. i., 2.

Musicians have no gold for sounding.

Shak., R. and J., iv. 5. 113.

The Stage.

After the second sounding [of the music].

B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, Ind.

sounding<sup>2</sup> (soun'ding), p. a. [< ME. soundyng, v.] 1. Causing or producing sound; sonorous; resounding; making a noise.

Ay me! whilst thee the shores and sounding seas

Wash far away.

Milton, Lycidas, l. 161.

2. Having a magnificent or lofty sound; hence, bombastic: as, mere sounding phrases.

Keep to your subject close in all you say;

Nor for a sounding sentence ever stray.

Dryden and Soame, tr. of Boileau's Art of Poetry, l. 182.

sounding-board (soun'ding-bôrd), n. 1. A canopy over a pulpit, etc., to direct the sound of a speaker's voice toward the audience. See abat-voix. Also soundboard.

Since pulpits fail, and sounding-boards reflect

Most part an empty, ineffectual sound.

Courier, Tusk, iii. 21.

2. In building, a board used in the deafening of floors, partitions, etc. See sound-boarding.—

3. Same as soundboard, 1.

sounding-bottle (soun'ding-bot'l), n. A vessel for raising water from a great depth for examination and analysis. It is generally made of wood, and has valves opening upward in the top and bottom. It is fixed on the sounding-line over the lead, so that the water passes through it as the line descends; but when it is drawn up the force of gravity closes the valves, thus retaining the contents. It often contains a thermometer for showing the temperature below the surface.

sounding-lead (soun'ding-led), n. The weight used at the end of a sounding-line.

sounding-line (soun'ding-lin), n. A line for trying the depth of water.

sounding-machine (soun'ding-ma-shēn'), n. A device for taking deep-sea soundings. See deep-sea.

sounding-post (soun'ding-pôst), n. Same as sound-post.

sounding-rod (soun'ding-rod), n. A graduated rod or piece of iron used to ascertain the depth of water in a ship's pump-well, and consequently in the hold.

soundismant, n. A Middle English form of sandcman.

Then sent were there some soundismen two

To Priam, the prise kyng, purpos to hold.

soundless<sup>1</sup> (soun'dles), a. [< sound<sup>1</sup> + -less.] Incapable of being sounded or fathomed; unfathomable.

He upon your soundless deep doth ride.

Shak., Sonnets, lxxx.

soundless<sup>2</sup> (soun'dles), a. [< sound<sup>5</sup> + -less.] Having no sound; voiceless; silent; dumb.

For your words, they rob the Hybla bees,

And leave them honeyless. . . .

Bru. O yes, and soundless too;

For you have stol'n their buzzing, Antony.

Shak., J. C., v. 1. 36.

sound-line (soun'dlin), n. The tow-line carried down by a whale when sounding.

sound-post (soun'd-pôst), n. In musical instruments of the viol class, a small cylindrical wooden prop or pillar which is inserted between the belly and the back, nearly under the treble foot of the bridge. Its purpose is to prevent the crushing of the belly by the tension of the strings, and to transmit the vibrations of the belly to the back. Its material, shape, and position are of great importance in determining the quality and power of the tone. It is sometimes called the instrument's soul or voice. Also sounding-post.

sound-proof (soun'dprûf), a. Impervious to sound; preventing the entrance of sounds.

It (silicate of cotton) is of great efficiency as a stuffing for sound-proof walls and flooring.

sovereignty (suv'- or sov'e-rän-ti), n.; pl. sovereynties (-tiz). [Early mod. E. also soveraignly, soverayntie, etc.; < ME. soveraynghtye, sovereynhtec, soverainhtec, soverainte, < OF. soverainie, soverainie, F. soverainie = It. soverania (cf. Sp. Pg. soberania). < ML. as if **superanitia* (-tis), < superanus, supreme, sovereign: see sovereign.]

1. The state or character of being sovereign or a sovereign.

So sitting high in dreaded soverayntie,
Those two strange knights were to her presence brought.
Spenser, F. Q., V. ix. 34.

I think he'll be to Rome
As is the osprey to the fish, who takes it
By sovereyntie of nature. Shak., Cor., iv. 7. 35.

Specifically—(a) Mastery; control; predominance.

Women desirous to have sovereyntie,
As wel over hir housbond as hir love.
Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 182.

I was born to command,
Train'd up in sovereyntie.
Fletcher (and another?), Prophetess, iv. 3.

(b) The rule or sway of a monarch; royal or imperial power.

Julius Augustus . . . let the true nature of his power be seen, and, first among the Cæsars, arrayed himself with the outward pomp of sovereyntie.

E. J. Freeman, Venice, p. 133.

(c) Supremacy or dominion; hegemony: applied to the relation between a powerful state and other states or regions: as, Rome's sovereyntie over the East; Great Britain holds the sovereyntie of the seas. (d) The supreme, absolute, uncontrollable power by which any state is governed (Cooley); the political authority, whether vested in a single individual or in a number of individuals, to order and direct what is to be done by each individual in relation to the end and object of the state (Halliwell). It is essential to the modern conception of sovereignty that it should be exclusive of any other human superior authority, should be wielded by a determinate person or organization of persons, and should be on the whole habitually obeyed by the bulk of the community. Thus, in the United States, sovereignty is vested in the body of adult male citizens. The claim that each State—that is, the adult male free citizens of each State—possessed a separate sovereignty was one of the elements of controversy involved in the civil war.

I state Ansteth's doctrine of Sovereignty in another way, more popularly, though without, I think, any substantial inaccuracy. It is as follows: There is, in every independent political community—that is, in every political community not in the habit of obedience to a superior above itself—some single person or some combination of persons which has the power of compelling the other members of the community to do exactly as it pleases. This single person or group—this individual or this collegiate Sovereign . . . may be found in every independent political community as certainly as the centre of gravity in a mass of matter. If the community be violently or voluntarily divided into a number of separate fragments, then, as soon as each fragment has settled down (perhaps after an interval of anarchy) into a state of equilibrium, the Sovereign will exist and with proper care will be discoverable in each of the now independent portions. The Sovereignty over the North American Colonies of Great Britain had its seat in one place before they became the United States, in another place afterwards; but in both cases there was a discoverable Sovereign somewhere. This Sovereign, this person or combination of persons, universally occurring in all independent political communities, has in all such communities one characteristic common to all the shapes Sovereignty may take, the possession of irresistible force, not necessarily exerted, but capable of being exerted. . . . The Sovereign, if a single person, is or should be called a Monarch; if a small group, the name is an Oligarchy; if a group of considerable dimensions, an Aristocracy; if very large and numerous, a Democracy. Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 349.

Much is said about the sovereignty of the States. . . . What is sovereignty in the political sense of the term? Would it be for wrong to define it "a political community without a political superior"? Tested by this, no one State, except Texas, ever was a sovereignty.

Lincoln, in Raymond, p. 146.

The chief attributes of sovereignty with which the states have parted are the coining of money, the carrying of mails, the imposing of tariff dues, the granting of patents and copyrights, the declaration of war, and the maintenance of a navy.

J. Fiske, Amer. Pol. Ideas, p. 98.

(c) A state, community, or political unit possessing independent power.

The into colonies had but recently become compactly organized self-governing States, and were standing somewhat stiffly apart, a group of consequential sovereignties, jealous to maintain their blood-bought prerogatives, and quick to distrust any power set above them, or arrogating to itself the control of their restive wills.

W. H. Wilson, Cong. Gov., I.

(f) Supremacy in excellence; supreme excellence.

Fie, fie, unrevenged tongue! to call her bad
Whose sovereignty so oft thou hast preferred
With twenty thousand soul-confirming oaths.

Shak., T. G. of V., II. 6. 15.

(g) Efficacy; especially, medicinal efficacy.

My father left me some prescriptions
Of rare and proved effects, such as his reading
And manifest experience had collected For general sovereignty. Shak., All's Well, I. 3. 230.

Popular sovereignty. See popular.—Sovereignty of God, in theol., God's absolute dominion over all created things.—Squatter sovereignty. Same as popular sovereignty. [Colloq., U. S.]

This letter [Gen. Cass on Wilmot Proviso] is notable as the first clear enunciation of the doctrine termed Popular (otherwise Squatter) Sovereignty—that is, of the lack of legitimate power in the Federal Government to exclude Slavery from its territories.

H. Greeley, Amer. Conflct, I. 190.

SOVRAN (suv'- or sov'-ran), a. and n. [A modified form of sovereign, in imitation of the It. sovrano: see sovereign. It was first used by Milton, and has been affected by later poets.] Same as sovereign.

Since he
Who now is Sovran can dispose and bid
What shall be right. Milton, P. L., I. 240.

SOVRANTY (suv'- or sov'-ran-ti), n. [A modified form of sovereignty, in imitation of sovrani.] Same as sovereignty.

God's gift to us of sovranty.
Mrs. Browning, Dramm of Exile.

To scatter, as seed upon the earth, for the purpose of growth; plant by sowing.

In my saule thou sœwst thil sode,
That I may, lorde, make myne aunnt.

Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnival), p. 107.

Whatsoever a man sœweth, that shall he also reap.
Gal. vi. 7.

2. To scatter seed over for growth; supply or stock with seed.

It werē a gode Contree to sœwen inne Thristelle and Berres and Broom and Thornes; and for no other thing is it not good. Mandeville, Travels, p. 130.

And the same hand that sœw'd shall reap the field.
Pope, Messiah, l. 66.

3. To scatter over; besprinkle; spangle: as, a velvet pall sown with golden beads.

God . . . form'd the moon, . . .
And sow'd with stars the heaven, thick as a field.

Milton, P. L., vii. 358.

Another [cottage] wore
A close-set robe of fashino sown with stars.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

4. To spread abroad; cause to extend; disseminate; propagate: as, to sow discord.

Why, nothing can be baser than to sow Dissention amongst lovers.

Deau, and Pl., Maid's Tragedy, III. 1.
To have hemp-seed sown for one. See hemp-seed.—
To sow one's wild oats. See oat.

II. intrans. To scatter seed for growth and the production of a crop.

They that sow in tears shall reap in joy. Ps. cxxvi. 5.
Peace was awhile their care. They plough'd and sow'd.
Couper, Task, v. 202.

sow<sup>2</sup> (sou), n. and a. [< ME. sowe, sowe, suwe, soghe, < AS. sugu, contracted sū, = MD. sogh, sogh, D. zog, zeng = MLG. sog, LG. sug, sige = *OHG. fete, and falle oute of howe rorys. Also gave hym whyte wormes that breede betweene the barke and the tre.

MS. Lancelot 306, f. 177. (Halliwell.)

Some of the Oniscidae are land animals, and are known as hog-lice, sows, etc. Pascoe, Zool. Class., p. 84.

3. In metal, the metal which has solidified in the common channel or feeder through which the molten iron flows from the blast-furnace into a series of parallel grooves or furrows, which are the "pigs" appertaining to the sow, and the iron from which bears the name of pig-iron, or simply pig: used also of other metals.

It is the manner (right worshipful) of such as seeke pauit by mineral, first to set men on worke to digge and gattier the oore; then by fire to treute the metall, and to cast it into certein rude lumpes, which they call sowes.
Lambride, Perambulation (ed. 1590), Pref. (Halliwell).

For the strengthening of his nerves or sinews, they made him two great sows of lead, each of them weighing eight thousand and seven hundred quintals. . . . Those he took up from the ground, in each hand one.

Urguartz, tr. of Rabelais, I. 23.

4†. A military engine consisting of a movable roof arranged to protect men handling a battering-ram. Compare rinca, also cat and cat-castle.
—Old sow. See add.—To have, take, or get the right (or wrong) sow by the ear, to pitch upon the right (or wrong) person or thing; come to the right (or wrong) conclusion. [Low.]

He has the wrong sow by the ear, I' faith; and elaps his dish at the wrong man's door.

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, II. 1.

You have a wrong sow by the ear.

sowar (sō'ār), n. [Also smār; < Hind. sawār, < Pers. sawār, a horseman.] A horse-soldier; especially, a native cavalry soldier in the British-Indian army, often in the sense of an orderly or mounted attendant or guard.

In the cavalry of the Madras army the horses are provided by Government, but in that of Bengal and Bombay the trooper, or sowar, as he is designated in India, finds himself in everything except his arms.

N. A. Rev., CXXVII. 145.

sowback (sou'bak), n. A low ridge of sand or gravel; a hogback or horseback; a kame; a drum or drumlin.

The long parallel ridges, or "sowbacks" and "drums," as they are termed, . . . invariably coincide in direction with the valleys or straths in which they lie.

J. Geikie, Orient Ice Age, p. 17.

sowbane (sou'bān), n. The maple-leaved goose-foot, Chenopodium hybridum, regarded as fatal to swine. Also called hog's-bane.

sow-belly (sou'bol'i), n. Salt pork; salt-horse;
salt-junk: used by fishermen, whalers, sailors, and soldiers. [Low.]—sow-belly hake. See lake<sup>2</sup>.

sowbread (sou'bred), n. A plant of the genus Cyclamen, particularly C. Europeanum. The species are low stemless herbs sending up leaves and scapes from corms which are sometimes very large, and, where native, are sought after by swine. The flowers are rose-colored, pink, or white, nodding, the divisions of the corolla reflexed, and are cultivated for ornament, the best-known species being C. Europeanum, hardly in southern Europe and England, and the more tender and showy C. Persicum.

sow-bug (sou'bug), n. A hog-louse; a pill-bug;
a sow; any terrestrial isopod of the family Oniscidae, (Salsola Kali): also applied to the columbine, Aquilegia vulgaris.

sowel, n. Same as soul<sup>2</sup>.

sowens (sō'enz), n. pl. [Also sowans, sowins; origin obscure; cf. sew<sup>2</sup>.] 1. A nutritious article of food made from the farina remaining among the husks of oats, much used in Scotland and formerly in Northumberland. The husks (called in Scotland seeds or sides), after being separated from the oat-ment by the sieve, still retain a considerable portion of famineous matter. A quantity of the husks is steeped in water till the farinaceous matter is dissolved, and until the liquid has become sour. The whole is then put into a sieve, which allows the milky liquid to pass through into a barrel or other vessel, but retains the husks. The starchy matter gradually subsides to the bottom of the barrel. The sour liquor is then decanted off, fresh water is stirred into the deposit that is left, and the mixture, when boiled, forms sowens. In England it is more commonly called slummary. The singular form sowen is used attributively or in compounds: as, sowen-tub.

These sowens, that is, slummary, being blended together, produce good yeast. Mortimer, Husbandry.

As if it were any matter . . . whether a ploughman had supp'd on minced pies or sour sowens. Scott, Old Mortality, vii.

An' sing 't when we ha'e done.
Burns, First Epistle to Davie.

sowther, v. Same as souther<sup>2</sup>. Halliwell.

sow-thistle (sou'this'tl), n. [< ME. sowthystell, < AS. sugethistel, < sugu, sow, + thistel, thistle.
In ME. also called swines thistle.] A plant of the genus Sonchus, primarily S. oleraceus, a weed of waste places, probably native in Europe and central Asia, but now diffused nearly all over the world. It is a smooth herb with a milky juice, bearing rounded-pinnatifid leaves and rather small yellow flower-heads. A similar plant, but with less divided spiny leaves, is S. asper. A much more showy species is S. arvensis, with larger and brighter heads. These are all naturalized in the United States, the last less abundantly. The name has been extended to species of the allied genus Lactuca.

soy (soi), n. [Al-so soja; = F. soy, sou; = G. Sw. Dan. soja (NL. soja, soya); < Jap. si-yau, Chinese shu-yu, soy.] 1. A kind of sauce prepared in the East from the soy-bean (sood def. 2). It is eaten with fish, cold meat, etc. There are two or three qualities of soy, but the Japanese soy is reckoned the best.

I have been told that soy is made with a fishy composition, and it seems most likely by the taste; the a gentleman of my acquaintance who was very intimate with one that sailed often from Tompkins to Japan, from whence true Soy comes, told me that it was made only with Wheat and a sort of Beans mixt with Water and Salt.

From travellers accustomed from a boy To eat their salmon, at the least, with soy. Byron, Beppo, vii.

2. The soy-bean or -pen, Glycine Soja (Soja hispida, etc.). It is an annual leguminous plant with stout nearly erect, or somewhat climbing stems covered with rusty hairs, bearing trifoliate leaves and from their axils two or three pods  $\frac{1}{2}$  or 2 inches long. The seeds are made into the above sauce and variously used in cooking; an oil is also expressed from them, and the residue is extensively used in China for feeding cattle and as a fertilizer. The plant is native from northern India to Japan. The cultivated plant differs somewhat from the wild, and by some authors is distinguished as Glycine hispida. Also Sahua bean.

soya (soi'li), n. [Hind. soyā, sōā, fennel.] Dill. Also sōā.

soy-bean (soi'tiūn), n. See soy, 2.

soylet. An absolute spelling of soilt, soilt', soilt.

Soyaida (soi'mi-di), n. [NL. (Adrien de Jussieu, 1830), from the Telugu name.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Melastomataceae and tribe Stricklandia. It is characterized by flowers with five petals, united stemis forming a short tubular tube or cup, the lobes two-toothed, with sessile anthers between the teeth, and an oval five-celled ovary which ripens into a woody septicapular capsule with compressed and winged seeds destitute of albumen. The only species, S. febrina, is a native of the East Indies, where it is known as rohan (or rohan) and rohan. (See also rohan bark under bark) and purkait. It is a tall tree with bitter bark and hard wood, bearing abundantly pinnate leaves with obtuse opposite leaflets, and flowers in axillary and terminal panicles.

soy-pea (soi'pē), n. See soy, 2.

Sozobranchia (sō-zō-brang'ki-ā), n. pl. [NL. < Gr. sōzōn, save, keep, + NL. brachia, gills; see brachia.] A group of urochordate amphibians which do not lose the gills or tail. See Perennibranchiata.

sozobranchiate (sō-zō-brang'ki-āt), n. [< NL. sozobranchiatus, < Gr. sōzōn, save, keep, + NL. brachia; see brachia.] Preserving the gills, as a urochordate amphibian; perennibranchiate.

Sozura (sō-zū-rū), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of sozurus; see sozurus.] Urochordate (or tailed) gill-less batrachians, or those batrachians which lose the gills, but not the tail, when adult. They are a higher group than the Sozobranchia, both being together contrasted with the Anura or tailless batrachians.

sozurus (sō-zū-rūs), n. [< NL. sozurus, < Gr. sōzōn, save, keep, + oipa, tail.] Retaining the tail; pertaining to the Sozura, or having their characters.

sozzle (soz'l), v. t.; pret. and pp. sozzled, ppr. sozzling. [A var. of sozzle.] 1. To mangle confusedly. [Prov. Eng.]—2. To spill or wet through carelessness.—3. To splash. [U. S.]

A sand piper glided along the shore; she ran after it, but could not catch it; she sat down and sozzled her feet in the foam. S. Julia, Margaret, p. 8.

sozzle (soz'l), n. [< sozzle, v.] A state of sloppy disorder. [U. S.]

The woman, who in despite of poverty and every discouragement had always hated, to the very roots of her hair, anything like what she called a sozzle—whom had always been screwed up and sharp set to hard work. Mrs. Whitney, Leslie Goldthwaite, vii.

Sow-thistle (Souchus oleraceus). 1, upper part of the stem with the leaves; 2, one of the basal leaves; 3, a flower; 4, the achene with the pappus.

sozzly (soz'li), a. [< sozzle + -ly.] Sloppy; dragged; mentally flabby; shiftless. [Now Eng.]

Folks grows helpless all the time, and the help grows sozzlier; and it comes to naughtness . . . and changes. Mrs. Whitney, The Other Girls, xlii.

Sp. An abbreviation of Spanish.

sp. An abbreviation: (a) in phar., of spiritus, spirit; (b) in bot., of species, specimen; (c) in zool., of species only; when two or more species are meant, spp. is used.

S. p. An abbreviation of siue prole, without issue.

spa (spā or spā), n. [Formerly also spaw; < Spa, or Spaa, in the eastern part of Belgium, where there are mineral springs.] A mineral spring, or the locality in which such springs exist.

Past cure of phylis, spar, or any diel. Beau. and FL, Scornful Lady, iii. 2.

Never knew her better; . . . she has been as healthy as the German Spa. Sheridan, Rivals, ii. 1.

spaad (spād), n. [< D. spaath = F. spaath = Sp. spaato = Pg. spaato = It. spato, < MIG. spāt, < spāt, spūth, frinble stone, splinter, spar; origin unknown. Cf. feldspath.] A kind of mineral; spar.

English tale, of which the coarser sort is called plaster, the finer, spand, earth-flax, or salmagundi's hair. Woodward, (Johnson).

space (spās), n. [< ME. space, < OF. (and F.) espace = Pr. espace = Sp. espacio = Pg. espaço = It. spazio, < L. spatium, room, space, distance, interval, a public walk, etc., lit. 'that which is drawn out,' < √ spa, draw out; cf. Gr. spān, draw, draw out, skl. √ spān, fatten. Cf. spān, spād.]

1. The general receptacle of things; room, (a) as a character of the universe, (b) as a cognition or psychological phenomenon, (c) as a mathematical system. That which interval about space is that the manifoldness of the universe is subject to certain general laws or limitations. In this respect it is like any other uniformity of nature: it is peculiar only in the peculiar way in which we view it—namely, in this, that instead of thinking it, as we do other laws, as abstract and general, we seem to see it, we individualize it and its parts. This peculiarly does not, however, constitute the recognition of space as entirely ad generic, for there is a tendency to individualize other laws. The conception of space is formed, or at least connected with objects, by means of the so-called local signs, by which the recitation of one more terminal is distinguishable from a similar recitation of another, and which are analogous to the signs by which we distinguish present experiences from memories, imaginations, and expectations. These local signs are also the origin of our idea of individuality; so that it is not strange that this mode of being is so constituted as to be not merely to moving objects, but to the space and time that constitute the law of motion. The celebrated doctrine of Kant was that space is a form of pure intuition—that is, an idea supported by the mind into cognition, and corresponding to nothing in the things in themselves (though he did not add that special spatial relations were altogether illusory)—just as color is a quality of sensation which in its generally corresponds to nothing in the object, though differences of color correspond to differences in objects. That this intuition of space is individual, not general, and that no outward intuition is possible except under this form, were points also insisted upon by Kant. At present there are, broadly speaking, two views of space-perception. One is the great doctrine of Berkeley—worked out in different directions by J. S. Mill, Helmholtz, Lotze, Wundt, and others—that the idea of space is evoked under the combined influence of retinal sensations and of muscular sensations of motion, in a manner analogous to that by which the laws of dynamics have been evolved from experience. This is the theory which, under modern modification and further, is held by almost all modern scientific psychologists. Some competent writers, however, oppose this, holding that "all our sensations are possibly and inexplicably extensive wholes." This opinion conflicts with the usual one only in so far as it refuses to the inexplicability and irrationality of space. The vulgar conception of space as a sort of thing or substance of different categories from material things, through which the latter move without sensible resistance, is acceptable to mathematicians, who find that such a construction lends itself remarkably to their discriminative reasoning. For the geometer, space is primarily a system of points having the following properties: (1) It is continuous. See continuity, 2. (2) It is unlimited, whether the part at a finite distance from a given point be limited or not. (3) It has three dimensions—that is, a set of three numbers varying continuously may be placed in continuous one-to-one correspondence with the points of space. By a continuous correspondence is meant one in which no continuous variation in one member will correspond in any way to a continuous variation in the other. (4) All the points of space have perfectly similar spatial relations. (5) It is possible for a rigid body to move in space, and such a body is fixed by the fixation of three points, but not fewer. (6) Any figure may be magnified while preserving the proportionality of all its lines. Geometers often imagine these properties to be modified. In particular, they use the hypothesis of a space of four or more dimensions. They also often suppose the principle of similar figures, or what is the same thing, the doctrine of parallels, to be false, thus producing what is known as the non-Euclidean geometry. This is of various kinds.

Now to pure space lifts her celestial shroud, Now, running round the circle, finds its square. Pope, Dunciad, iv. 23.

Stars countless, each in his appointed place, Fast anchor'd in the deep abyss of space. Couper, Röllephant, i. 81.

2. The interval between any two or more objects, or between terminal points; distance; extent, as of surface: as, the space of a mile.

And so he hynr chased as fast as his horse myght hym bere, till he haddo lefto his felowes be-hynde the space of an arblast. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 104.

There shall be no space between you and it [the ark] about two thousand cubits by measure. Joshi, iii. 4.

I warrant he hath a thousand of these letters, writ with blank space for different names. Shak., M. W. of W., ii. 1. 77.

Four gray walls, and four gray lowers, Overlook a space of flowers. Tennyson, Lady of Shalott, l.

3. The interval between two points of time; quantity of time; duration.

There was silence in heaven about the space of half an hour. Rev. viii. 1.

Mean space I think to goe downe into Kenne. Cushman, quoted in Bradford's Plymouth Plantation, p. 37.

Nine times the space that measures day and night To mortal men he with his horrid crew Lay vanquish'd, rolling in the fiery Gulf. Milton, P. L., i. 60.

4. A short time; a while.

And, sith for me ye fight, to me this grace Both yield, to stay your deadly slyte npace. Spenser, F. Q., ii. vi. 33.

And Arthur and his knighthood for n space Were all one will. Tennyson, Coming of Arthur.

5. Hence, time in which to do something; respite; opportunity; leisure.

Ayryeth yow on it, when ye hnd npace, And of som goodely answere yow purliance. Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 1124.

And I gave her space to repent. Rev. ii. 21.

6. A path; course (?).

This like mank leet olde thynges pace, And heeld after the newo world the pace. Chaucer, Gen. Pro., lo C. T., i. 176.

7. In printing, one of the blank types which separate the words in print. The thicknesses most used are one third, one fourth, and one fifth of the square body of the text-type. Hair-spaces, still thinner, are also made. Spaces as thick as one half the square body and all thicker are known as quadrats.

8. In musical notation, one of the degrees between the lines of the staff. In the usual staff there are four spaces within the staff, but in the Gregorian staff there are only three. The name and significance of a space depend on the clef and the key-signature. See staff.

9. In ornith., an unfathered place on the skin between pteryx and an pterium. Cones, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 87.—Absolute, algebraic, basal space. See the adjectives.—Added space. Same as leger space.—Barycentric coordinates in space. Same as tetrahedral coordinates (which see, under coordinate).—Berth and space. See berth.—Cell-spaces, the spaces in the ground-substance of connective tissue which inclose the connective tissue corpuscles.—Chyle-spaces, the central lymphatic canals of the intestinal villi.—Complemenal spaces of pleura, the portion of the pleural cavity immediately above the insertion of the diaphragm, which is not filled by air in ordinary breathing.—Dangerous space (airlet), the zone before and behind the aortic arch covered by the trajectory. See battle-range, under battle.—Dead space, in fort. Same as dead angle (which see, under angle).—Deep cardiac space, the projection on the surface of the chest of the lung-covered portions of the heart. It borders on each side the superficial cardiac space.—Elliptic, Euclidean, extramundane, gastrovascular space. See the adjectives.—Fontana's spaces. Same as canal of Fontana (which see, under canal).—Geometry of space. See geometry.—Half-space or foot-space, in a staircase, a resting-place or broad space between two flights of steps.—Haversian spaces. See Haversian canal, under canal.—Hemal, hyperbolic, intercellular, interdental space. See the adjectives.—Hypoprostal space, the space lying between the rectum and the prostate. Ruchman.—Interlamellar spaces, the spaces between the lamellae of the cornea.—Interosseous space, the space between parallel long bones.—Interpeduncular space, the triangular space at the base of the brain, between the crura cerebri.—Interpleural space, see interpleural.—Lenticular space, see lenticular mark, under lenticular.—Linear, local, maxillopharyngeal, menal, middle, parabolic, parasinoidal, perforated, pericardial, popliteal, etc., space. See the adjectives.—Polar coordinates in space. See coordinate.—Quarter-space, a landing or interval at an angle of a stair.—Retropositional space. See retropositional.—Room and space. See room.—Superficial cardiac space, the area on the surface of the chest over that part of the heart which is not covered by the lung. It is represented with approximate accuracy by a right-angled triangle bounded by the midsternal line, a horizontal line through the point of the apex beat, and a line drawn through that point and the intersection of the midsternal line with a horizontal line through the fourth costosternal articulation.

spaco (spās), v.; pret. and pp. spaced, ppr. spacing. [< space, n. Cf. spatiate, exspatiate.] 1. To intrins. To move out large; exspatiate. [Rare.]

But she, as Faye was wont, in privy place Did spend her dayes, and lov'd in forests wyld to space. Spenser, F. Q., iv. ii. 44.

II. trans. 1. To set at intervals; put a space between; specifically, in printing, to arrange the spaces and intervals in or between so that there may be no obvious disproportion: as, to space a paragraph; to space words, lines, or letters.

The porch, too, is open, and consists of columns spaced equidistantly over its floor, without either the bracketing arrangements of the southern or the domical forms of the northern styles. J. Fergusson, Hist. Indian Arch., p. 389.

2. To divide into spaces.

The artificer is ordered "to set on the frames, and to space out the rooms, that the Nine Worthies may be so instaled as best to please the eye."

Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 27.

3. To measure by paces. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]—spaced braid, a white cotton braid used for the trimming of washable garments. The name is derived from the pattern, which exhibits flat and simple spaces between raised edging.—To space out, in printing, to put more spaces between the words or lines of.

space-box (spās'hoks), n. In printing, a petty case of wood or millboard, in six or eight divisions, holding the spaces needed for corrections on stone. Sometimes called space-barge or space-paper in England.

space-curvature (spās'kér'vā-tūr), n. A curvature of three-dimensional space in a space of four dimensions.

spaceful (spās'fūl), a. [< space + -ful] Wide; extensive. Sandys.

space-homology (spās'hō-mol'ō-jī), n. Geometrical homology in three dimensions.

spaceless (spās'les), a. [< space + -less] Destitute of space. Coleridge.

space-line (spās'lin), n. In printing, same as lead<sup>2</sup>, 3.

space-perception (spās'pér-sep'shon), n. The perception of space—that is, of bodies as extended or moving.

spacer (spā'sér), n. 1. A device used in cable telegraphy for reversing the current at proper intervals, thus increasing the speed of transmission; also used for a somewhat similar purpose on land-lines.—2. In a typewriter, a key, and the mechanism connected with it, by which spaces are made between words.

space-relation (spās'rō-lā'shon), n. A spatial relation, such as that two points lie within a tetrahedron of which four others are the vertices, and the like.

space-rule (spās'röl), n. In printing, a hair-line of type-metal, type-high and about one thirty-sixth of an inch thick. Such rules are made of many lengths, from one twelfth of an inch to half an inch. They are used for cross-lines in table-work.

space-writing (spās'wī'ting), n. In newspaper work, the system of payment to reporters or other writers in proportion to the space allowed to their articles in print; also, writing or work under this system.

The standard of literary excellence in the news columns of the New York press has also been lowered by the general substitution of space writing for the work of salaried reporters, as well as by the influence already referred to. Westminster Rev., CXXVIII. 853.

spacial, spaciality, etc. See spatial, etc.

spacing (spā'sing), n. [Verbal n. of space, v.] 1. The making of spaces. (a) The allowing and gaging of intervals between words in setting type, type-writing, or the like.

The change in the spacing being effected by a small cam at the side of the carriage. Sci. Amer., N. S., LV. 21.

(b) In art, mach., etc., the division of any surface into special parts.

In the spaces of decoration, as in all else, the Japanese artist studiously avoids uniformity or repetition of exact spacing. Encyc. Brit., XIII. 591.

2. A space thus made.

Each tongue upon discs is cut slantingly across at regular spacings by steam passages analogous to the guide-plate vents of water turbines. The Engineer, LXIX. 225.

3. Spaces collectively.

spacing-lace (spā'sing-lās), n. Same as scam-ing-lace.

spacious (spā'shus), a. [Formerly also spatious; < F. spacieux = Sp. espacioso = Pg. espaçoso = It. spazioso, < L. spatiosus, roomy, ample, < spatium, room, space: see space.] 1. Inclosing an extended space; of great extent; wide-extended.

As though no other place, on Britain's spacious earth, Were worthy of his end, but where he had his birth. Drayton, Polyolbion, l. 189.

The spacious firmament on high, With all the blue ethereal sky,

2. Having large or ample room; not contracted or narrow; roomy.

On the North side of the Church is a spacious Court, which I could not conjecture to be less than one hundred and fifty yards long, and eighty or one hundred broad.

Maunder, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 126.

Those melodious harpists that fill The spacious times of great Elizabeth.

Tennyson, Fair Women.

3†. Extensive; on a large scale; abounding; said of persons.

Is't possible that such a spacious villain

Should live, and not be plagued?

B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, l. 1.

=Syn. Wide, capacious, ample, broad.

spaciously (spā'shus-ly), adv. In a spacious manner; widely; extensively; roomily.

spaciousness (spā'shus-nes), n. The quality of being spacious; largeness of extent; extensiveness; roominess.

spadassin (spād'ā-sin), n. [< F. spadassin, < It. spadaccino, swordsmen, < spada, sword: see spade<sup>1</sup>, spathe.] A swordsman; especially, a person devoted to fencing and presumed to be expert with the sword; hence, less properly, a bravo.

Bully swordsmen, spadassins of that party, go swag-gering; or indeed they can be had for a trifle of money.

Carlyle, (Imp. Dict.)

Others destroy moles with a spaddle, waiting in the mornings and evenings for them. Mortimer, Husbandry.

spade<sup>1</sup> (spād), n. [*< ME. spade, < AS. spādū, spādū, also rarely spada, spad, in an early gloss spad, = OS. spada = OFries. spada, sword: see spade<sup>2</sup>, spathe, D. spade, spa = MLG. or curved) may be pressed into the ground or other resisting substance with one foot, and a handle, usually with a crosspiece at the top, to be grasped by both hands. A spade differs from a two-handed shovel chiefly in the form and thickness of the blade.

The nomen leo spade and schouelo and ner the place vende.

Deope heo gonne to deoue ther as the smoke out vende.

Hoely Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 43.

Strength may wield the pond'rous spade, May turn the clod, and wheel the compost home.

Cowper, Task, iii. 636.

2. A tool of soft iron used with diamond-powder by cameo-cutters in finishing.—3. In chaliug, a large chisel-like implement used on blubber or bone in cutting-in. See phrases following.—4. In herpet, a formation on the foot of some toads with which they dig. See spade-foot.—Boat-spade, an instrument, carried under the stern-sheets of a whale-boat, resembling a very large chisel, having a wide blade, and a handle six or eight feet long. This instrument was employed to stop a running whale by the process known as hamstringing or spading flukes (cutting the cords about the small), which required much experience and dexterity, and was a very hazardous undertaking; it has been done away with by the introduction of bomb-lances. The boat-spade is still carried in case of emergency.—Bone-spade, a cutting-spade, with a long thin shank, used by whalers for cutting out the throat-bone of a baleen-whale.—Cutting-spade, a sharp instrument like a very large narrow chisel fixed to a pole ten or more feet in length, used for cutting the blubber from a whale.—Half-round spade, a long-handled spade with a blade curved, or rolled up on the sides, resembling a carpenter's gouge, and used for cutting holes in the head of the blubber when boarding.—Shoe- ing of a spade, in her., same as spade-iron, 2 (b).—To call a spade a spade, to call things by their proper names, even though these may seem homely or coarse; speak plainly and without mincing matters. Various unnecessary conjectures have been made as to the supposed occult origin of this phrase; but it means what it says—to call a simple thing by its simple name, without circumlocution or affected elegance.

Chesham does not like to call a spade a spade. He calls it a horticultural utensil. Thackeray, Philip, xxiil.

—2. In chaliug, to use the boat-spade on, as a whale; cut the tendons of the flukes of; hamstring.

spade<sup>2</sup> (spād), n. [Prob. < Sp. Pg. espada, spade at cards, usually in pl. espadas, spades (sing. espada, the ace of spades); appar. a particular use of espada, a sword (< L. spatha, < Gr. σπάθη, a broadsword), these cards having, it is said, among the Spaniards, the figure of a sword; according to others the figure was orig. intended, as in the cards now in use, for the head of a pike, in which case the name spade is prob. an orig. E. designation, the head of a pike sufficiently resembling the pointed spade: see spade<sup>1</sup>.] A playing-card of one of the two black suits of a pack, the other being clubs.

"Let Spades be trumps!" she said, and trumps they were. Pope, R. of the L., lii. 46.

spade-bayonet (spād'bā'ō-net), n. A broad-bladed implement intended to be attached to a military rifle; a trowel-bayonet. It is capable of being used for digging, as in sinking a tent-pole, making hasty intrenchments when better tools are not within reach, and the like, and is also capable of use as a weapon.

spade-bonet (spād'bōn), n. The blade-bone, shoulder-blade, or scapula.

By th' shoulder of a ram from off the right side par'd, Which usually they boil, the spade-bone being bar'd.

Drayton, Polyolbion, v. 266.

spade-farm (spād'fārm), n. A farm or piece of ground kept especially for manual labor with the spade, whether for producing garden vegetables or the like, or with a view to the perpetuation of a certain kind of labor.

spade-fish (spād'fīsh), n. Chaetodipterus faber: same as moonfish (d). See angel-fish, 3, and cut under Chaetodipterus.

spade-foot (spād'fūt), a. and n. I. a. Spade-footed; scaphiopod.

II. n.; pl. spade-foots (-fūts). A spade-footed or scaphiopod toad; a spade-toad. There are several species of different genera, one of the best-known being Scaphiopus holbrooki, of eastern and southerly parts of the United States.

Spade-foot (Scaphiopus holbrooki).

spade-footed (spād'fūt'ed), a. Scaphiopod, as a toad; belonging to the Scaphiopodinae.

spadeful (spād'fūl), n. [< spade<sup>1</sup> + -ful.] As much as can be taken up with a spade.

spade-graft (spād'grāft), n. The depth to which a spade will dig; about a foot. Also spade's graft. [Prov. Eng.]

They [British relics] were discovered in 1827 near Guls-borough, at about a spade's graft beneath the surface.

Proc. Soc. of Antiq. (1844), I. 30. (Darvies.)

Obverse.

Reverse.

Spade-guinea, 1787.—British Museum. (Size of the original.)

spade-guinea (spād'gin'ē), n. A guinea coined by George III. during the period 1787-99. It is now so called because the shield of arms on the reverse has the shape of the spade of playing-cards. See cut on preceding page.

spade-gun (spād'gun), n. A gun having a recess in the stock to hold a spade or trowel, and a socket in the butt-plate to which the spade can be fitted for use as an intronching-tool.

spade-handle (spād'hann'ol), n. 1. The handle of a spade. Hence—2. In mach., a pin held at both ends by the forked ends of a connecting-rod.

spade-husbandry (spād'huz'band-ri), n. A mode of cultivating the soil and improving it by means of deep digging with the spade instead of using the subsoil-plow.

spade-iron (spād'ir'ern), n. 1. The blade of a spade, with the tang or socket by which it is secured to the handle.—2. In her., a bearing representing (a) the whole blade of a spade, without the handle or with a truncated piece of the handle, or (b) an iron or steel border put upon the blade of a spade to reinforce or repair it. This border is generally represented with some ornamental outline engraved or lobed on its inner edge, and is also called shoeing of a spade.

spader (spā'dēr), n. One who or that which spades; a digging-machine.

The steam-ploughs and horse-ploughs did their work well, and the rotary spader did its work well.
—W. H. Whitman, The Galaxy, IV. 608.

spade-raek (spād'rak), n. A rack on board a whaler, underneath the spare boats, in which the boat-spades are kept when not in use.

spadiard (spād'yārd), n. [Appar. < spade + -iard, but perhaps an error for spaliard.] A worker in a tin-mine. Kennett; Halliwell. [Cornwall, Eng.]

spadic (spā'dik), n. [Brazilian.] Same as coccol.

spadicaceous (spā-dis'ic-us), a. [L. spadicus, < spadix, < Gr. σπάδις, a palm-brunch, also nut-brown, palm-colored, bay; see spadix.] 1. Of a bright-brown color; bay; chestnut.

Of those five [unicorns' horns] which Scalliger beheld, though one [was] spadicaceous, or of a light red, and two inclining to red, yet was there not any of this complexion among them.
—Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., III. 23.

2. In bot., bearing or having the nature of a spadix. See petaloidaceous, eudogen, and Monocotyledonous.

Also spadicions.

spadices, n. Plural of spadix.

spadicifloral (spā-di-si-flō'ral), a. [L. spadiciflorus, < spadix, < Gr. σπάδις, a palm-brunch, also nut-brown, palm-colored, bay; see spadix.] In bot., having flowers borne on a spadix.

spadicose (spād'i-kōs), a. [L. spadicus (-ic-) + -ose.] In bot., spadiceous; growing on a spadix.

spadilla (spā-dil'ia), n. [See spadille.] In the game of solo, the queen of spades, which is always the highest trump.

spadille, spadillo (spā-dil'ia, -yō), n. [L. spadille, < Sp. espadilla (= It. spadiglia), a small sword, the ace of spades, dim. of Sp. espada = Pg. espada, spade (at cards), the ace of spades; see spade, spade.] In card-playing, the ace of spades at ombre and quadrille. In the following quotation spadille is personified as Spadillio.

Spadillio first, unconquerable lord, Led off two captive trumps and swept the board.
—Pope, II. of the L., III. 49.

spading-machine (spā'ding-mā-shōn'), n. A digging-machine.

spadix (spā'diks), n.; pl. spadices (spā-dī'sēz). [NL., < L. spadix, < Gr. σπάδις, a branch broken off, esp. a palm-brunch, hence palm-colored, bay, < σπάρ, tear, rend, stretch out.] 1. In bot., a form of inflorescence in plants, in which the flowers are closely arranged in a spike or head which has a fleshy or thickened rachis. The term is mostly restricted to the Araceæ and the Palmae, and further to those cases in which the inflorescence is accompanied by the pedicel bract or bracts called a spathe. See cuts under Araceæ, Indian, and inflorescence.

2. In zool.: (a) The hectocotylus of the male cephalopod: a specialized part of the fore foot, on one side, which becomes hectocotylized, or assumes a sexual function. On the opposite side is a corresponding part, not subject to hectocotylization, called the antispadix. (b) In Hydrozoa, the manubrium of the hydromedusans, an offset of a blastostyle bearing the genital products, like the part of a pen-pod which bears the pens. (c) [cap.] A genus of coelenterates.

spado (spā'dō), n. [L., < Gr. σπάδω, a cunuch, < σπάρ, tear, rend, pluck off or out. Cf. spade, n.] 1. A castrated animal; a gelding. Imp. Diet.—2. In civil law, one who from any cause has not the power of procreation; an impotent person.

spadone (spā-dō'no), n. [It., aug. of spada, a sword; see spade. Cf. spadroon.] A long and heavy sword, usually one wielded by both hands. It was commonly carried without a scabbard, held and across the back, with the handle projecting over the right shoulder, or resting on the shoulder as the modern right shoulder arms, and for this reason the heel of the blade was often covered with leather, there being no edge for the first quarter or third part of its length, and sometimes a small secondary guard was interposed before the sharp part of the blade begins. See cut under second, Heavitt.

spadronet (spa-drōn'), n. Same as spadone.

spadroon (spa-drōn'), n. [F. dial. espadran, f. espadon = Sp. espadon, a large sword, a broadsword, < It. spadone, a sword; see spadone.] Same as spadone.

spæ (spæ), v. i. and t.; pret. and pp. spæd, ppr. spæcing. [Also spay; < leol. spā = Sw. spā = Dan. spaa, prophesy; cf. OS. spāhi = OHG. spāhi, MIIG. spāhe, wise, skilful; OHG. spēhōn, MIIG. spēhen, G. spēhen, spy; see spy.] To foretell; divine; predict from signs or indications. [Scotch.]

Tell me the very minute o' the hour the wean's born,
And I'll spæ its fortune.
—Scott, Guy Mannering, III.

spac-book (spā'huk), n. A book containing directions for telling fortunes, etc. [Scotch.] spaceman (spā'mann), n.; pl. spacemen (-men). A fortune-teller; diviner; soothsayer. [Scotch.] spacr (spā'ēr), n. [Also spae + -er.] A spaceman or spacwife; a fortune-teller. [Scotch.]

A spær o' poor folk's fortunes.
—Blackwood's Mag.

spacwife (spā'wif), n.; pl. spacwives (-wivz). A female fortune-teller. [Scotch.]

Plague on her for an auld Highland witch and spæcife;
... she'll cast some of her entrails on the cattle.
—Scott, Chronicles of the Canongate, xlii.

spaghetti (spā-get'ti), n. [It., pl. of spaghetta, dim. of spaga, a small cord.] A kind of Italian macaroni made in the form of cords smaller than ordinary macaroni, but several times larger than the threads of vermicelli.

spagiri (spā-jir'ik), a. and n. [Also spagyric, spagyric; = F. spagirique; irreg. formed (it is said by Paracelsus) < Gr. σπάρ, rend, tear, stretch out, + ἀγίρνω, bring or collect together.] 1. a. Chemical or alchemical; pertaining to chemistry as taught by Paracelsus and his followers.

It was a huge diligence and care of the divine mercy that discovered to man the secrets of spagyric medicines.
—Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 191.

II. u. A chemist, especially one devoted to alchemical pursuits.

spagirical (spā-jir'ik-ul), a. [Also spagyric, spagyric; < spagyric + -al.] Same as spagyric.

spagirist (spā-jir'ist), n. [Also spagyrist; < spagyric + -ist.] A Paracelsian chemist or physician of the sixteenth or seventeenth century; a follower of Paracelsus in regarding inorganic chemistry as the basis of medical knowledge.

No more than I can tell who initiated Mr. Boyle among the Spagyrics, before I had the honour to know him.
—Keelyn, To Mr. Wotton.

spahce, spahi (spā'hē, -hi), n. [Formerly also spachi; = F. spahi, < Turk. sipahi = Pers. Hind. sipāhi; see spah.] 1. A member of the corps of Turkish cavalry organized in the fourteenth century on a feudal basis, who fought in a very disorderly manner, and were disbanded soon after serving as the chief instruments in the suppression of the Janizaries in 1826.

But the Spahies and Janizaries ... are the Nerves and Supporters of the Turkish Monarchy.
—Sandys, Traveller (ed. 1673), p. 32.

2. One of the corps of native Algerian cavalry in the French service, originally formed from the Turkish spahies serving in Algeria at the time of the French conquest.

spail. See spale, spale.

spairge (spā'rz), v. t. A Scotch form of sparge.

spait, n. See spate.

spaiwe (spā'wē), v. t. A dialectal variant of spay.

spake (spāk), n. A Scotch form of spoke.

Your cage shall be made o' the benton gold,
And the spakes o' Ivorie.
—May Colvin (Allingham's Ballad-book, p. 217).

spake. An archaic or poetic preterit of spak. spake, a. [ME., also spak, spac, < leol. spak, quiet, gentle, wise, = Sw. spak = Dan. spag, quiet, gentle, tame.] 1. Quiet; tame.

It sat sato by lym so spake.
—Rob. of Brunne, Handlyng Synne, I. 7486.

2. Ready; prompt.

Spae to uel and slaw to god.

Old Eng. Hom. (ed. Morris), I. 305.

spakely, adv. [ME., also spakly, spakli, spakli; < spake + -ly.] Quickly; speedily; nimbly.

Spek to me spakli or I spille some.

William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), I. 1535.

One semblable to the Samaritan and some-del to Piers the Flowman, Barfote on an asse bakko botelees cam pryke.

Wyth-outo spores other spere spakliche he looked.

Piers Plowman (B), xviii. 12.

The blode spreto owtte, and sprede as the horse sprygez,

And he sproulez fullo spakely, bot spekes he no more.

Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), I. 2063.

spake-net (spāk'net), n. [Also spake + net.] A net for catching crabs.

Spalacidae (spā-las'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spalax (-ac-) + -idae.] A family of myomorph rodents, typified by the genus Spalax; the mole-rats proper, having small or rudimentary eyes and ears, short tail and limbs, and fossorial fore foot and claws: divided into two subfamilies, Spalacinae and Bathyerginae. Also Aspalacidae, and formerly Georychidae. See cuts under Bathyergus, mole-rat, and Rhizomys.

Spalacinae (spal-ā-sī'nō), n. pl. [NL., < Spalax (-ac-) + -inae.] A subfamily of Spalacidae, including the typical mole-rats, in which the mandibular angle is in relation with the socket of the lower incisor. See Spalax. Also Aspalacinae.

spalacine (spal'ā-sin), a. Of or pertaining to the Spalacidae or Spalacinae.

Spalacopodidae (spāl'ā-kō-pod'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spalacopus (-pod-) + -idae.] A family of hystricomorphic rodents, named by Lilljeborg (1866) from the genus Spalacopus. It is inexactly equivalent to the Ocotodontidae of authors, but includes the prehensile-tailed porcupines (Cercolabidae). It was divided by Gill (1872) into four subfamilies, Ocotodontinae, Ctenodactylinae, Echimyinae (Echimyinae), and Cercolabinae. See Ocotodontidae.

Spalacopus (spāl-lak'ō-pus), n. [NL. (Wagler, 1832), < Gr. σπάλας (spalax), a mole, + πούς = Lat. foot.] The name-giving genus of Spalacopodidae, now a member of the family Ocotodontidae and subfamily Ocotodontinae. The ears are rudimentary, the tail is short, and the fore claws are shorter than their digits. The skull and teeth resemble those of Schizodon. There are two South American species, of fossorial habits, constructing extensive subterranean burrows in which they live. They have been called porcupones, from a synonymous genus Porphagomys.

Spalax (spāl'laks), n. [NL. (Güldenstädt), < Gr. σπάλας, also σπάλας and σπάλας, a mole.] The typical genus of mole-rats, subfamily Spalacinae, having the eyes rudimentary and covered with skin. It contains S. typhlus, the sleeper or blind mole-rat of Europe, the most completely mole-like of the rodents in general appearance, habits, and adaptive modifications of structure. Also Aspalax. See cut under mole-rat.

spald (spāld), v. [Also dial. spaud; < ME. spalden, spawden, < MD. spalden = MLG. spalden, spolden = OHG. spallan, MIIG. G. spalten (> Dan. spalle), split, cleave; akin to speld, spelt; cf. spall, spale.] Hence spald. 1. t. trans. To splinter; chip.

He thane speris where sproungene, spald dyl chippys.

Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), I. 3700.

II. intrans. To founder, as a ship. [Prov. Eng., in form spauld.]

spald (spāld), n. [Also (Sc.) spauld, spawld; < ME. spalde, spawde; a var. of spalt; see spalt.] The shoulder.

Ly stillo therein now and roste,
I kepe nothyng of thi oste
No noghte of thi spalde.

Perceval, I. 796. (Halliwell.)

The bul . . . Jenaud his spald to the stok of ane tre.

Gavin Douglas, Æneid, XII. 410.

spalder (spāl'dēr), n. [Also spald + -er.] In stone-working, a workman who spalls or scales off small flakes by the use of a heavy ax-shaped hammer, or muckle-hammer.

spalding-knife (spāl'ding-nif), n. A knife for splitting codfish. E. H. Knight.

spale (spāl), v. t.; pret. and pp. spaled, ppr. spaling. [A var. of spalt, split, etc.: see spalt.] To break up.

spale (spāl), n. [Also spail; < ME. spale; cf. leol. spāl (spat), a rail, bar, short piece, bit; in part a var. of spalt, spelt, in part appar. due to spale, r.: see spelt, and cf. spalt.] 1. A chip or splinter of wood. [Old Eng. and Scotch.]—2. In ship-building, one of a number of cross-bands fastened temporarily to the frames to keep them in place until properly secured. Also called spaling.

spale (spāl), v. t. [Also spail; perhaps a particular use of spale.] In mining, to inflict a fine upon for breach of some rule of the mine. Heale.

spall<sup>1</sup> (spāl), v. [Also spawl; a later form of spald, in part due to spall, n.] I. trans. 1. To split; splinter; chip; specifically, in mining, to chip or break up roughly, as ore, preparatory to sorting the material.—2. [spall<sup>1</sup>, n.] To keep (the frames of a ship) at their proper distance apart.

II. intrans. To splinter; chip; give off spalls. spall<sup>1</sup> (spāl), n. [Also spawl; < ME. spalle; a var. of spell, speal, etc., in part due to spall<sup>1</sup>, v.: see spell<sup>4</sup>, and cf. spald<sup>1</sup>, spale<sup>1</sup>.] A chip or splinter thrown off, as in chopping or hewing; now specifically, in masonry, a piece of stone chipped off by a blow of a hammer or mallet. spall<sup>2</sup>, spawl<sup>3</sup> (spāl), n. [Also spaul, and formerly spald, spauld; < ME. **spanle*, spalde, spawde, < OF. espaule, **espaule*, F. épaule = Sp. Pg. espalda = It. spalla, the shoulder, < L. spatula, a broad blade: see spatula. Cf. epaulet.] The shoulder. [Obsolete or Scotch.]

Their mightie strokes their habergeons dismayd,
And naked made each others manly spalles.

Spenser, F. Q., II. vi. 29.

spallier (spal'yér), n. [Also spaliard; cf. spaldier.] A laborer in tin-works. Hallivell.

spalling-floor (spāl'ing-flôr), n. A clear space on the ground, a low platform, or something similar, on which ores are spalled.

spalling-hammer (spāl'ing-ham'ér), n. A heavy ax-like hammer with a chisel-edge, used for rough-dressing stone by chipping off small flakes; in mining, any hammer with which spalling is done.

spalpeen (spal'pēn), n. [Ir. spailpín, a mean fellow, rascal, stroller (= Gael. spailpín, a mean fellow, a fop), < spailpín, a beau, also pride, self-conceit, = Gael. spailpín, pride, self-conceit: cf. spailpín, strut, walk affectedly.] A mean fellow; a rascal: a term of contempt, or of contemptuous pity, for a man or boy. [Irish.]

The spalpeen! turned into a buccie that would be a squire, but can't. Miss Edgeworth, Love and Law, I. 4.

Of all oke growing in England, the park oke is the softest, and far more spalt and bricke than the hedge oke. Harrison, Descrip. of Eng., II. 22 (Holinshed's Chron., I. 1).

2. Frail; clumsy; heedless; pert. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

spalt<sup>3</sup> (spält), n. [G. spalt(-stein), spalt, lit. 'splinter-stone,' < spalten, split (see spalt<sup>1</sup>), + stein, stone.] A whitish sealy mineral, used to promote the fusion of metals.

span<sup>1</sup> (span), v.; pret. and pp. spanned, ppr. spanning. [ME. spannen, < AS. spannan, spannan (pret. speōnan), gespannan, bind, connect, = D. spannan, stretch, bend, hoist, cock (a gun), hitch (horses), = MLG. LG. spannen = OHG. spannan, MHG. G. spannen, extend, connect, = Icel. spenna, span, clasp, = Sw. späna, stretch, strain, draw, = Dan. spande, stretch, strain, span, buckle; < √ span, perhaps, with present formative -n, < √ spa, extend, in Gr. σπάειν, σπένειν, draw, draw out (see spasm), L. spatium, extension, space (see space). Cf. spin, speed.] I. trans. 1. To stretch or spread out; extend in continuity; give extent to.

My right hand hath spanned [spread out, R. V.] the heavens. Isa. xlvi. 13.

2. To stretch from side to side or from end to end of; extend over or across; continue through or over the extent of.

This soul doth span the world. G. Herbert, Content.

The Rhynacae is still spanned by an ancient bridge of three arches. B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 295.

The existing church shows portions of work a thousand years apart, and spans nearly the whole of Aquileian history. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 63.

3. To make a stretch or reach along, over, or around; measure or cover the span of; grasp; specifically, to measure or encompass with the hand, the little finger and thumb being extended as far as possible: as, to span a stream with a log or a bridge; to span a person's wrist.

Theanc the kinge spanes his spere.

Avenging of Arthur, st. 13. (Skeat.)

Off on the well-known spot I fix my eyes,
And span the distance that between us lies.

Tickell, An Epistle.

How your plump arms, that were, have dropped away!
Why, I can span them. Browning, Pippa Passes, III.

4. To cock by the use of a spanner, as a wheel-lock musket or pistol.

Every man, officer and soldier, having a pistol ready spanned in one hand. Clarendon, Civil Wars, III. 248.

5. Naut., to confine with ropes: as, to span the booms.—6. To shackle the legs of, as a horse; hobble. [Prov. Eng.]

II. intrans. 1. To measure off or mark distances from point to point; make distinct stretches in going, as a span-worm or measuring-worm does.

If the whale is spanning, i. e. swimming in a decided direction and appearing at the surface at intervals more or less regular, less caution is observed.

Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 526.

2. To be matched for running in harness; form a span: as, the horses span well. [U. S.]

span<sup>1</sup> (span), n. [ME. spanne, spanne, < AS. span, a span (def. 4), gespan, a joining, connection, = D. span, a span, a team of horses, = OHG. spanna, MHG. G. spanne (> It. spanna = OF. cspan, F. empan) = Icel. spönn (spann) = Sw. spann = Dan. spand, a spau; from the verb.] 1. The full extent or course over which anything is stretched or prolonged; the space or time covered or included between terminal points; entire reach from end to end or from side to side: as, the span of life; the span of a bridge. As used of physical things, span is understood as the actual or net space or distance between bounding lines or surfaces; hence, the span of an arch is the length of the opening between the inner faces of its abutments. Compare def. 2. Often used figuratively.

The brief span of Roman literature, strictly so called, was suddenly closed under a variety of influences.

Mine, Village Communities, p. 281.

Two arches over the same span of river, supposing the buttments are at the same depth, are cheaper than one.

Ruskin, Elements of Drawing.

Yea, Manhood hath a wider span
And larger privilege of life than man.

Loeell, Comm. Ode.

2. A part or division of something between terminal points: as, a bridge of ten spans. In this sense a span would comprise the distance from the middle line of one pier or support to that of the next, the whole number of spans including the entire length of the structure. [The decision of the case referred to in the first quotation turned upon the distinction between senses 1 and 2.]

The word span does not, even in architecture, always mean a part of a structure. It is, perhaps, as often used to denote the distance or space between two columns. Such is the obvious import of the term as used in the act under consideration, not merely as a part of the structure itself, but the measure of the distance between the piers of the bridge.

U. S. Supreme Ct., March, 1883. (Judge Lamar.)

The channel spans were built out from the central pier and from the adjacent flanking spans without the use of false works in either channel. Scribner's Mag., IV. 32.

3. Extent of stretch, physical or mental; distance over which anything may be extended; reach or grasp, as of the memory or of perception. [Rare.]

Between the ages of eight and nineteen the span of school-girls increases from 6 to 7.9 for letters, and from 6.6 to 8.6 for numerals. Span increases not only with age, but with rank in class, and it is suggested that a "standard span" be added to the items for an anthropometric measurement. Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 193.

4. As a measure, originally, the extent between the tips of the thumb and little finger when stretched out: the oldest use of the word in English. The span belongs to the system of long measure to which the cubit and fingerbreadth belong. It has always been considered as half a cubit, and still is so in several countries of Asia. The English span is 9 inches. The Swedish spann is an entirely different kind of measure.

Spanne, measure of the hand. Palmas.

Prompt. Parv., p. 467.

Whyche Morteyes ys in Depnese IJ Spannyes to the botom;
the brede ys sumwhat more thane a Spanne.

Torkington, Diary of Eng. Travell, p. 43.

Atween his shoulders was ne span,

About his middle war hut thre.

The Wee Wee Man (Child's Ballads, I. 126).

5. Figuratively, any short space or period; a brief or limited extent or course; a relatively small measure of continuity.

Behold, thou hast made my days as it were n span long.

Book of Common Prayer, Psalter, xxxix. 6.

For the refreshing of that one span of ground God lets fall a whole shower of rain.

Donne, Sermons, x.

Thyself but Dust; thy Statute but a Span,

A Moment thy Duration; foolish Mankind!

Prior, Solomon, I.

6. The hand with the fingers outspread, as for measuring or for grasping a handful of something. [Rare.]

And my Conductor, with his spans extended,

Took of the earth, and, with his fists well filled,

He threw it into those rapacious gullets.

Longfellow, tr. of Dante's Inferno, vi. 25.

7. Naut., a rope fastened at both ends so that a purchase may be hooked to its bight; also, a double rope having thimbles attached between its two parts, used as a fair-lead for ropes.—8. (a) In the United States (from the original Dutch usage), a pair of horses or mules harnessed together; particularly, a pair of horses usually driven together, or matched for driving or work. (b) In South Africa, two or more yokes of oxen or bullocks attached to a wagon or a plow. For a wagon the span may consist of from twelve to twenty animals, and for a plow of six or eight.

span<sup>2</sup>. An archaic preterit of spin.

OF. chien espagnol, F. chien épagneul, a Spanish dog; < Sp. Español, Spanish: see Spaniard.] I. n. 1. A dog of a domestic breed, of medium and small sizes, with a long silky and usually curly coat, long, soft, drooping ears, feathered tail and stern, of docile, timid, and affectionate disposition, much used for sporting purposes and as pets. The most usual colors are liver and white, red and white, or black and white, in broken or mixed areas, sometimes deep brown or black on the face or breast, with a tan mark over the eye. Spaniels sport or are bred into many strains, and three classes of them are sometimes distinguished: land, or field, spaniels, including the cocker and springer; water-spaniels; and toy spaniels, as the King Charles and the Blenheim. The English spaniel is a superior and very pure breed; and, although the name spaniel would seem to indicate a Spanish origin, it is most probably indigenous. This dog was used in the days of infancy to start the game. The King Charles is a small black-and-tan variety of the spaniel; the Blenheim is similar, but white marked with red or yellow; both should have a rounded head with short muzzle, full eyes, and well-fringed ears and feet. The Maltese dog and the lion-dog are also small toy spaniels, used as lap-dogs. The water-spaniels, large and small, differ from the common spaniel in the roughness of their coats, and in uniting the aquatic propensities of the Newfoundland dog with the fine hunting qualities of their own race. Leading strains of the spaniels are the Clumber, Norfolk, and Sussex, in different colors. 2. Figuratively, a mean, cringing, fawning person; a blindly submissive follower: from the characteristics of the spaniel in relation to its master, or when in a state of fear.

He, unhappy man! whom your advancement Hath ruin'd by being spaniel to your fortunes, Will curse he train'd me hither. Ford, Fancies, III. 5.

II. a. Like a spaniel; fawningly submissive; mean; servile; cringing.

It is characterized by flowers with a short perianth-tube enlarged and bell-shaped above, unilobed erect stamens, and slender undivided recurved style-branches. The fruit is a membranous three-valved loculicidal capsule. There are 5 (or as some regard them 11) species, all natives of the Cape of Good Hope. They are bulbous plants with a slender stem bearing a few flat or sword-shaped erect or curving leaves, and handsome flowers, each solitary and sessile within a thin dry fringed spathe, marked with brown lines. They are valued as summer-flowering bulbs, and numerous low-growing varieties are in cultivation, especially of S. tricolor and S. grandiflora, of various colors from white to crimson, generally with a dark center. The bulb of S. bulbifera is edible. See harlequin-flower.

3. To withhold the use or doing of; refrain from; omit; forbear; forego: often with a second (indirect) object.

The rather will I spar my praises towards him;
Knowing him is enough. Shak., All's Well, II. i. 106.

Spar my sight the pain
Of seeing what a world of tears it costs you.
Dryden, Spanish Friar, v. 1.

But, if thou spar to fling Excalbur,
I will arise and slay thee with my hands.
Tennyson, Morte d'Arthur.

4. To refrain from injury to; leave unhurt or undisturbed; forbear from harming or destroying; treat with moderation or consideration; withhold severity or exaction from; refrain from unkindness to; specifically, to allow to live.

Spar ye not her young men; destroy ye utterly all her host.
Jer. II. 3.

My husband is thy friend; for his sake spar me.
Shak., Measure, I. 482.

But now, if spared, it is my full intent
On all the past to ponder and repent.
Crabbe, Works, I. 60.

As a man constrained, the tale he told
From end to end, nor spared himself one word.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 350.

5. Used reflexively, to be sparing of one's self; be chary or diffident; act with reserve.

Hir thought that a lady sholde hire spare,
What for hire kynrede and hire northrie.
Chaucer, Reeve's Tale, I. 46.

II. intrans. 1. To be frugal or saving; economize; act parsimoniously or stingily.

I, who at some times spend, at others spar, Divided between carelessness and care.
Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. II. 290.

2. To withhold action of any kind; refrain from the doing of something, especially something harmful or harsh; hold one's hand; keep quiet; hold off.

He may nat spar although he were his brother,
He moot as wel seye o word as another.
Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., I. 737.

When thay to thair master cam,
Leytell John wold not spar.
Robin Hood and the Potter (Child's Ballads, V. 29).

To spar for. (a) To be saving or reserved on account of or with reference to; stint the use or amount of: us, he spared not for risk or cost to accomplish his purpose.

I shall spar for no spenceo & thi spede welle,
And do thi deuer dely as a duke nobill.
Destruction of Troy (E. F. T. S.), I. 233.

(b) To withhold effort for; desist from. York Plays, p. 352. (c) To refrain on account of; allow to deter or hinder. Babes Book (E. F. T. S.), p. 36.

spar<sup>1</sup> (spär), n. [ME. sparl, r.] 1. Frugal use; saving; economy; moderation; restraint.

Spend in measure as thou dost get;
Make spar of that thou hast.
Babes Book (E. F. T. S.), p. 91.

Our victuals failed us, though we made good spar of them.
Bacon, New Atlantis.

Pour'd out their plenty without sight or spar.
Spenser, F. Q., III. l. 51.

2. In American bowling, an advantage gained by the knocking down of all the pins by rolling two balls: us, to make a spar. In such a case, when the player's turn comes again, the pins knocked down by his first ball are added to those made in the spar to complete the record of that turn, while they count also in the record of the new turn. Compare strike.

spar<sup>2</sup> (spär), n. [Early mod. E. also sparre, sparere, sparre; < ME. speyre, sprey; origin obscure.] An opening in a gown or petticoat; a placket. Prompt. Par., p. 468.

She took out a little penknife, Hung low down by her spar.
Sir Hugh, or the Jew's Daughter (Child's Ballads, III. 332).

spar-built (spär'bilt), a. Built or formed without fullness or robustness; slender. Scott, Rokeby, II. 22.

sparful (spär'fūl), a. [ME. sparl + -ful.] Sparing; chary. Fairfax.

sparfulness (spär'fūl-nes), n. The quality of being sparing or sparing.

Largess his hands could never skill of sparfulness.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, II.

sparely (spär'li), adv. [ME. sparlliche (= MLG. sparlliche); < spar + -ly.] Sparingly; scantily; thinly; leanly.

Ye valleys low, . . .
On whose fresh lap the swart-star sparely looks.
Milton, Lycidas, I. 138.

spareness (spär'nes), n. [CF. AS. spærnes, frugality.] The state of being spare, lean, or thin; leanness.

sparer (spär'er), n. [ME. sparere; < spar + -er.] One who spares, or avoids unnecessary expense; a frugal spender. [Rare.]

By nature far from profusion, and yet a greater sparer than a sayer.
Sir H. Wotton.

sparerib (spär'rib), n. [Formerly also spear-rib; < spar + rib.] A cut of pork consisting of the upper part of a row of ribs with the meat adhering to them. Sparerib roasted or broiled is esteemed a delicacy.

Sparganium (spär-gä'ni-um), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. sparganium, < Gr. σπαργάνιον, a plant, bur-reed, so called from the ribbon-like leaves, dim. of σπάργανον, a fillet, a swaddling-band, < σπάγγω, swathe.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants, of the order Typhaceæ. It is distinguished from the other genus of that order, Typha, by hyaline scales of the perianth, oblong or wedge-shaped anthers, and sessile ovary. There are about 6 species, natives of both hemispheres in temperate and subfrigid regions. Three somewhat polymorphous species occur in the northeastern United States. They are aquatic herbs, sending up from Bur-reed (Sparganium angustifolium).

1. Flowering plant. 2. Part of the inflorescence, showing the glabrous male head.

slender rootstocks erect or floating smooth spongy stems, and alternate entire linear leaves, usually with a sheathing base, stiffly ascending at a wide angle with the stem (whence they were formerly called reed-grass). The flowers form globular heads, the upper staminate, the lower pistillate, in fruit becoming spherical compact burr-like bodies composed of many sharp-pointed spongy nutlets (whence the popular name bur-reed). They are sometimes planted along the margin of water. The stems have been used to make paper, and the roots of S. ramosum and S. simplex were once in repute as a remedy for snake-bites.

sparganosis (spär-gä-nō'sis), n. [NL., as if < Gr. σπαργάνωσις, wrapping in swaddling-clothes (see Sparganium); prop. spargosis, < Gr. σπαργωσις, a swelling, distention: see spargosis.] Same as spargosis.

sparge (spärj), v. t.; pret. and pp. sparged, ppr. sparging. [Sc. spairge; < L. spargere, strew, sprinkle; cf. asperge, asperse, disperse, etc.] 1. To sprinkle; scatter.

Wha lu yn cavern, grini and sootie,
Closed under latches,
Spairges about the brunstane cootie.
Burns, Address to the De'il.

2. To throw water upon in a shower of small drops. See sparger.

spargefactiont (spär-jē-fak'shon), n. [< L. spargere, strew, sprinkle, + factio (n.), < facere, do, make.] The act of sprinkling. Swift, Tale of a Tub, iv.

sparger (spär'jēr), n. [< sparge + -er.] 1. A sprinkler; usually, a cup with a perforated lid, or a pipe with a perforated nozzle, used for damping paper, clothes, etc.—2. In brewing, a perforated cylinder, or a series of disks, for discharging hot water in a fine shower over grain falling into a mash-tub.

spargett, spargetingt. Same as pargett, pargetti.

spargosis (spär-gō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. σπαργωσις, a swelling, distention, < σπαργάνωσις, be full to bursting, swell.] In pathol.: (a) Distention of the breasts with milk. (b) Same as pachydermia. Also sparganosis.

sparhawk (spär'hāk), n. A contracted form of sparrow-hawk. Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 338.

Sparidae (spar'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sparus + -idae.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Sparus, to which different limits have been assigned; the sea-breams. (a) In the early system of Bonaparte, same as Cuvier's fourth family of acanthopterygian fishes (Sparoidae), which included, besides the true Sparidae, many other fishes. (b) In Günther's system, a family of Acanthopterygii percoformes, having ventrals perfect, no bony stay for the preoperculum, a lateral line, and either a series of trencant teeth in the jaws or molars on the sides. (c) In Jordan and Gilbert's classification, acanthopterygian fishes of the ordinary type with the supranaxillary bones slipping under the preoperculum. It thus included not only the true Sparidae, but the Pristigasteridae, Lutjanidae, Pomacentridae, and Lobidae. (d) By Gill restricted to fishes of an oblong compressed form with peculiar scales, continuous lateral line, head compressed, supraaxillary bones retractile under the suborbitals, dorsal with the spinous part depressible in a groove and about as long as the soft part, pectorals with lower rays branched, and ventrals suborbital and complete. The family thus limited comprises numerous species, among which are some of the most esteemed of the temperate seas, such as the gilt-heads of Europe, and the sheepshead and scup of the eastern American coast. Also Sparoidae. See cuts under Pimelcterus, porgy, Scorpius, scup, and sheepshead.

sparidal (spar'i-dāl), a. Same as sparoid.

Sparinae (spär'i-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Sparus + -inae.] A subfamily of sparoid fishes, typified by the genus Sparus, to which various limits have been assigned. (a) The genera Sparus, Sargus, and Charax: the Sparinae of Bonaparte. (b) By Jordan and Gilbert used for sparoids having molar teeth on the sides of the jaws, none on vomer, palatines, or tongue, entire opercle, and few pyloric caeca, including Sparus, Sargus, or Diplodus, and various other genera.

sparine (spär'in), a. and n. [< sparus + -ine.] 1. a. Sparoid, in a narrow sense; closely resembling a sparus; belonging to the Sparinae.

II. n. A sparoid fish of the subfamily Sparinae.

sparing (spär'ing), n. [< ME. sparynge; verbal n. of sparc, v.] 1. Parsimony.

Sparynge. Parcelmonia. Prompt. Parc., p. 467.

2. pl. That which is saved by frugality or economy; savings. [Rare.]

The sparings of the whole week which have not been laid out for chances in the lottery are spent for this evening's amusement. Houelle, Venetian Life, v.

3. The state of being spared from harm or death.

If the Lord give you sparing to-morrow, let me hear four words of comfort from you for God's sake. J. Careless, in Bradford's Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 241.

sparing (spär'ing), p. a. [Ppr. of sparc, v.] 1. Inclined to spare or save; economical; frugal; chary; grudging.

Too near and sparing for a soldier,
Too grudging, and too greedy.

Fletcher (and another?), Prophetess, i. 2.

Defer not to do Justice, or be sparing of Mercy. Baker, Chronicles, p. 166.

2. Of a spare amount, quantity, or extent; not abundant or lavish; limited; scanty; restrained: as, a sparing diet; sparing applause.

The use of confutation in the delivery of sciences ought to be very sparing. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 34. Inclined to spare from harm or hardship; not oppressivo; forbearing.

Their king . . . was sparing and compassionate towards his subjects. Bacon.

sparingly (spär'ing-li), adv. In a sparing manner; with frugality, moderation, scantiness, reserve, forbearance, or the like; sparsely.

Touch this sparingly, as 'twere far off. Shak., Rich. III., III. 5. 63.

sparingness (spär'ing-nēs), n. The character of being sparing or inclined to spare; especially, frugality, scantiness, or the like: as, the sparingness of one's diet.

A year afterward he entered the ministry again, and lived with the utmost sparingness. George Eliot, Felix Holt, vi.

spark (spärk), n. [< ME. sparke, sperke, sparc, sparc, spearke, < AS. spearca, spearca = MD. sparcke, spercke, D. sparc = MLG. LG. sparke (> OE. csparque), a spark; perhaps so called from the crackling of a firebrand: cf. Icel. Sw. spraka = Dan. sprage, crackle, Lith. sprageli, crackle, Gr. σπάγγω, a crackling, Skt. √ spāh, rumble.] 1. A particle of ignited substance omitted from a body in combustion; a fiery particle thrown off by burning wood, iron, powder, or other substance.

He multo . . . blown so littletho thet suni sperke multo newlken. Ancien Rithe, p. 96.

Man is born unto trouble, as the sparks fly upward. Job v. 7.

Hence—2. A scintillating or flying emanation, literally or figuratively; anything resembling a spark of fire: as, sparks from a gem; a spark of wit.

To try if it were possible to get a spark of human spirit out of you. Scott, Woodstock, v.

For all the haft twinkled with diamond sparks. Tennyson, Passing of Arthur.

3. A small diamond used with many others to form a setting or frame, as to a cameo or a miniature painting; also, a distinct crystal of diamond with the natural curved edges, suitable for glaziers' use.

This madonna invites me to a banquet for my discourse, t'other . . . sends me a spark, a third a ruby, a fourth an emerald. Shirley, Wld in a Cage, II. 1.

These writhing diamonds are sparks set in steel tubes much like everpoint pencils. Lea, Photography, p. 427.

4. A separate bit or particle of fire or burning matter in an otherwise inert body or mass; hence, a bit of anything, material or immaterial, comparable to this in its nuclear character or possible extension of activity.

If any spark of life be unquench'd in her, This will recover her. Beau. and Fl., Knight of Malta, III. 2.

If the true spark of religious and civil liberty be kindled, it will burn. D. Webster, Speech, Bunker Hill Monument, June 17, 1825.

Electric spark, the luminous effect produced when a sudden disruptive electrical discharge takes place between two charged conductors, or between two conductors at different electric potentials. The length of the spark depends primarily upon the difference of potential of the two charged bodies; it is hence in general a conspicuous phenomenon with high-potential frictional electricity, and not with ordinary voltaic currents. See electricity, Fairy sparks. See fairy.

spark<sup>1</sup> (spärk), v. [< ME. sparcken, < AS. spearcian = MLG. LG. sparcken, omit sparks; from the noun: see spark<sup>1</sup>, n.] I. intrans. 1. To emit sparks, as of fire or electricity; sparkle or scintillate. Spenser.—2. In elect., to produce sparks at points where the continuity of the circuit is interrupted. The production of sparks is due to the formation of a small arc between the extremities of the broken conductor, and also to self-induction in the circuit. Sparking often takes place between the collecting brushes and the commutator of the dynamo. It is injurious to the machine, aside from the actual dissipation of energy which it involves. It also occurs to an injurious degree in other electrical apparatus in which currents are frequently interrupted. Various measures are resorted to for the purpose of reducing it to a minimum or avoiding it altogether. See spark-arrester, 3.

There is no sparkling at the brushes. S. P. Thompson, Dynamo-Elect. Mach., p. 113.

II. trans. 1. To affect by sparks, as of electricity; act upon by the emission or transmission of sparks. [Recent.]

The insulation is apt to be sparked through and spoiled. Elect. Rev. (Eng.), XXIV. 550.

Whenever a large Leyden jar is sparked through the coil. Philos. Mag., XXVII. 339.

2. To splash with dirt. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng. or Scotch.]

spark<sup>2</sup> (spärk), n. [Usually associated with spark<sup>1</sup>, sparkish, sparkling, etc., but perhaps a var. of sprack (cf. ME. sparklich, var. of sprackliche), < Icel. sparkr, usually transposed sprakr, sprightly: see sprack.] 1. A person of a gay or sprightly character; a gay, lively, showy man (or, rarely, in former use, woman); a "blade" or roysterer.

Robbin Hood upon him set With his courageous sparkes. True Tale of Robin Hood (Child's Ballads, V. 358).

I will wed thee To my great widdowes daughter and sole heir, The lovely spark, the bright Laodice. Chapman, Widdowes Teares, l. (Davies.)

Their worthy father . . . was, at his years, nearly as wild a spark. Sheridan, School for Scandal, l. 2.

2. A lover; a gallant; a beau. [Colloq.]

Fly to your spark; he'll tell you more of the matter. Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer, III.

spark<sup>2</sup> (spärk), v. [< spark<sup>2</sup>, n.] I. intrans. To play the spark or gallant; court. [Colloq.]

A sure sign that his master was courting, or, as it is termed, spark, within. Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 432.

The boys that do a good deal of *spark*ing and the girls that have a lot of beaux don't always get married first. E. Eggleston, The Graysons, xxxiii.

II. trans. To pay attention to, especially with a view to marriage; court; play the gallant to, in a general sense: as, he is *spark*ing Miss Doe; to spark a girl home. [Colloq.]

spark-arrester (spärk'a-res'tēr), n. 1. A fender of wire netting.—2. A netting or cage of wire placed over the smoke-stack of a steam-engine. In some arresters a deflector is placed in the stack, against which the sparks strike, and fall into a reservoir below. Also called spark-consumer.

3. A device for preventing injurious sparking in electrical apparatus at points where frequent interruptions of the circuit occur, as in telegraph-keys, relays, and similar instruments. It consists in some cases of a spark-coil or high-resistance connective across the point of interruption, so that the circuit is never actually broken, but only greatly reduced. In others it is a condenser whose plates are connected each with one extremity of the broken circuit. In this case the energy of the current induced on breaking is expended in charging the condenser. Also spark.

spark-condenser (spärk'kōn-den'sēr), n. In elect., an instrument having a glass cage in which a spark may be passed between the battery connections. It is used for burning metals or obtaining the spectra of gases, and is designed to isolate the atmosphere in which the experiment is conducted, so as to eliminate accidental disturbing causes, and also to enable the experiment to take place in an atmosphere of any required condensation or tenuity.

spark-consumer (spärk'kōn-sū'mēr), n. In a steam-engine, a spark-arrester.

sparked-back (spärkt'bak), a. Having a streaked or variegated back; streaked-back: as, the sparked-back plover, the turnstone. [Local, Massachusetts.]

Hitherto will our *spark*full youth laugh at their great grandfather's English. Camden, Remains, Languages.

I have been detained by a sparkish coxcomb, who pretended a visit to me. Wycherley, Country Wife, IV. 2.

A daw, to be sparkish, trick'd himself up with all the gay feathers he could muster. Sir R. L'Estrange.

sparkle (spär'kl), v.; pret. and pp. sparkled, ppr. sparkling. [Early mod. E. also sparcle, sparcle; < ME. sparcken, sparcleu, sperelen (= MD. sparckelen); freq. of spark<sup>1</sup>. Cf. spark<sup>1</sup>, n.] I. intrans. 1. To emit sparks; send off small ignited particles, as burning fuel, etc.—2. To shine as if giving out sparks; glitter; glisten; scintillate, literally or figuratively: as, a brilliant sparkles; a sparkling beauty; sparkling wit.

The Sea seemed all of a Fire about us; for every sea that broke sparkled like Lightning. Dampier, Voyages, I. 414.

The rosy sky, With one star sparkling through it like an eye. Byron, Don Juan, II. 183.

sparkling heat, such a heat as produces sparks; especially, a degree of heat in a piece of iron or steel that causes it to sparkle or emit sparks under the hammer; a welding-heat.—Sparkling wine, wine characterized by the presence or the emission of carbonic-acid gas to little bubbles which sparkle or glisten in the light.—Syn. 1 and 2. Scintillate, Glitter, etc. (see glare, v. i.), coruscate.
II. trans. 1. To emit with coruscations; throw out sparkingly.

The bright glisters of their beames cleare
 Did sparkle forth great light.

Spenser, F. Q., III. i. 32.

2. To scatter; disperse. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

The riches of Darius was left alone, and lay sparkled abroad on all the fields.

J. Brende, tr. of Quintus Curtius, iii. 43.

3†. To sprinkle; spatter.

The paucement of the temple is all sparkled with bludde.
Peter Martyr (tr. in Ede's First Books on America, ed. Arber, p. 196).

sparkle (spär'kl), n. [ME. sparkle, sparele, with dim. -le, -el, < sparkl; or < sparkle, v.] 1. A spark; an ignited or a luminous particle, or something comparable to it; a scintillation; a gleam.

Foure gledes han we, whiche I shal devyse, Avaunting, lying, anger, covetise,
 This fourc sparkles longen unto elde.

Chaucer, Troil. to Reeve's Tale, l. 31.

And drove his heel into the smoulder'd log,
 That sent a blast of sparkles up the flue.

Tennyson, Morte d'Arthur.

2. The act or state of sparkling; emission of sparks or scintillations; sparkling luminosity or luster: used literally or figuratively.

Swift as the sparkle of a glancing star
 I shoot from heaven, to give him safe convoy.

Milton, Comus, l. 80.

A zest and sparkle ran through every part of the paper.
G. S. Merriam, S. Bowles, II. 359.

sparkleberry (spär'kl-ber'i), n. Same as farkleberry.

sparkler (spär'klér), n. [< sparkle + -er.] 1. A thing which or a person who sparkles; that which or one who gives off scintillations, as of light, beauty, or wit: often applied specifically to gems, especially the diamond.

But what would you say, should you see a Sparkler shaking her elbow for a whole night together, and thumping the table with a dice-box? Addison, Guardian, No. 120.

It [Mercury] keeps so near the sun . . . that very few people have ever seen the brilliant sparkler.

H. W. Warren, Astronomy, p. 113.

2. One of various species of tiger-beetles (Cicindela): so called in allusion to their shining or sparkling appearance when running in the sunshine. See cuts under Cicindela.

sparkless (spär'les), a. [< sparkl + -less.] Free from sparks; not emitting sparks: as, a sparkless commutator. Electric Review (Eng.), XXVI. 203.

sparklessly (spär'les-li), adv. Without the emission of sparks.

sparklet (spär'let), n. [< sparkl + -let.] A small spark, or minute sparkle; a scintillating speck. [Rare.]

sparkliness (spär'li-nes), n. Sparklingness; sparkling vivacity. Aubrey, Lives (John Suckling).

sparklingly (spär'ling-li), adv. In a sparkling manner; with twinkling or vivid brilliancy.

sparklingness (spär'ling-nes), n. The quality of being sparkling; vivid and twinkling luster.

spark-netting (spär'net'ing), n. A spark-arrester or spark-consumer.

sparling<sup>1</sup> (spär'ling), n. [Also sperling, spirling, sporling, spurling; < ME. sparlynge, sperlyng, sperlynge, spurlunge = MLG. sperlink = G. sperling (> OF. esperlane, esperlan, F. éperlan; ML. sperlingus), a smelt; cf. D. spiering, a smelt.] 1. A smelt. [Prov. Eng.]

For sprats and sparlings for your house.
Tusser, Husbandry.

2. A samlet; a smolt. [Wales.] sparling<sup>2</sup> (spär'ling), n. [Also spurling; < spearl + -ling, from the sharp, picked bill.] A tern or sea-swallow. [Prov. Eng.]

sparling-fowl (spär'ling-fowl), n. The goosander or merganser, especially the female. J. Latham.

sparliret, n. [ME., also sparlyre, sperlire, sparlyuer, sperlyuer, the calf of the leg, a muscle, < AS. sperlira, sperlira, spearlira, < spar, spare, + lira, fleshy part of the body without fat or bone: see sparc<sup>1</sup> and lire<sup>2</sup>.] The calf of the leg.

Smyt thee the Lord with the moost ynel biel in knees, and in sparlyuers. Wyclif, Deut. xxviii. 35.

spar-maker (spär'mä'kér), n. A carpenter whose special business is the making of masts, yards, etc.

Sparmannia (spär-man'i-i), n. [NL. (Linnaeus filius, 1781), named after Andreas Sparmann or Sparmann, a Swedish naturalist of the 18th century.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Tiliaceae, the linden family, and of the tribe Tiliaceae. It is characterized by the outer stamens being without anthers, the numerous inner ones perfect, and by a globose or ovoid capsule which is echinate with rigid bristles. There are three species, natives of tropical or southern Africa. They are shrubs or trees with soft stellate pubescence, bearing toothed or lobed heart-shaped leaves and white flowers in small terminal umbelliform cymes which are surrounded by an involucre of short bracts. S. Africana is a handsome greenhouse shrub reaching from 6 to 12 feet high, with ornamental long-stalked leaves and downy white flowers with yellow and brown sterile stamens. It produces a fiber of very fine texture, known as African hemp, and recommended for its strength and beautiful silver-gray color.

Sparoid (spä'roid), a. and n. [< NL. Sparus + -oid.] 1. a. Resembling a sea-bream; of or pertaining to the Sparidae in a broad sense. Also sparidal.—Sparoid scales, scales characteristic of sparoid fishes—thin, wide, with lines of growth proceeding from their hind border. Agassiz.

II. n. A sparoid fish.

Sparoidæ (spä'roi'de), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Sparidae.

sparplet (spär'pl), v. t. [Also sparble; < ME. sparplen, sparyllen, < OF. esparpeiller, F. éparpiller, scatter, fly off like a butterfly; = Pr. esparpillar = It. sparpagliare, scatter, fly off like a butterfly. Cf. disparple.] To scatter; spread abroad; disperse.

Thei made the renges to sparple o-brode.

Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 306.

sparret, n. and v. An obsolete form of sparl.
sparrer (spär'ér), n. One who spars; one who practises boxing. Thackeray, Adventures of Philip, vii.

sparrow (spar'ô), n. [< ME. sparowe, sparwæce, sparwece, sparwe, < AS. spearwa, spearwea, in early glosses spearwa, = OHG. sparo (sparw-), sparwe, MHG. spar (MHG. dim. sperline, sperling) = Icel. spörr = Sw. sparf = Dan. spurv = Goth. sparwa, a sparrow; prob. from the root of spur, spurn, 'kick, quiver': see spur. Cf. MD. sparwer, sperwer, D. sperwer = MLG. sparwer, sperwer = OHG. sparuari, sparuari, MHG. sperwære, sparwære, G. sperber (cf. It. spaviere, spaviere = Pr. esparvier = OF. espervier, F. épervier, in ML. sparuarius, sparuarius, esparvius, < OHG., cf. Sp. esparvado), a sparrow-hawk, lit. 'sparrow-eagle', the second element being OHG. aro (in comp. -ari), eagle: see earn<sup>3</sup>. Cf. sparver, sparv.] 1. The house-sparrow, Passer domesticus, a fringilline bird of Europe, which has been imported and naturalized in America, Australia, and other countries. It is about 6 inches long and 9½ in extent of wings. The upper parts of the male are ashy-gray, boldly streaked on the back with black and bay; there is a dark-chestnut or mahogany spot on each side of the neck; the lesser wing-coverts are chestnut; the median are tipped with white, forming a wing-bar; the greater coverts and inner secondaries have a black field bordered with gray; and the lower parts are ashy or gray, with jet-black on the throat, spreading on the breast, and bordered on the side of the neck with white. The female is similar, but more plainly feathered, lacking the distinctive head-markings of the male. The sparrow is a voracious granivorous bird, whose food is principally seeds and grain, yet it has been introduced in many countries for the purpose of destroying noxious insects. It is extremely hardy, pugnacious, and prolific, rearing several large broods annually. Of all birds the sparrow naturally attaches itself most closely to man, and easily modifies its habits to suit artificial conditions of environment. It is thus one of several animals, as rats, mice, and other vermin, well fitted to survive under whatever conditions man may offer or enforce; hence it wins in competition with the native birds of the foreign countries where it naturalizes, without as readily developing counteractive agencies to check its increase. It speedily becomes a pest wherever introduced, and seldom destroys noxious insects to any appreciable extent. It was brought into the United States from Germany about 1860, and is now probably more numerous than any single native bird. In New York city thousands of sparrows are sold and eaten as reed-birds. See cut under Passer<sup>2</sup>.

2. Some or any fringilline bird resembling the sparrow, as Passer montanus, the tree-sparrow; one of various finches and buntings, mostly of plain coloration. In the United States the name is given, with a qualifying word, to very many small sparrow-like birds, mostly of homely streaked coloration. Chipping- or field-sparrows belong to the genus Spizella; crown-sparrows to Zonotrichia; fox-sparrows to Passerella; grasshopper-sparrows to Coturniculus; the grass-sparrow to Poocetes; the lark-sparrow to Chondestes; sage-sparrows to Amphispiza; savanna-sparrows to Passerculus; seaside sparrows to Ammodramus; snow-sparrows to Junco; song-sparrows to Melospiza. See cuts under Chondestes, Coturniculus, Embernagra, field-sparrow, grassfinch, sage-sparrow, savanna-sparrow, snowbird, and song-sparrow.

3. Some little bird likened to or mistaken for a sparrow. Thus, the hedge-sparrow is the hedge-chantrel, Acceptor modularis, and some other warblers are loosely called sparrows.—Bush-sparrow, the hedge-sparrow, Acceptor modularis.—English sparrow, the common European house-sparrow, Passer domesticus: so called in the Java Sparrow (Padda oryzivora).

United States. See def. 1.—Green-tailed sparrow, Blanding's finch. See finch.—Java sparrow, the rice-bird of Java, Amadina (Munia) or Padda oryzivora, about as large as the bobolink, of a bluish-pink color with pink bill and white ear-coverts: a well-known cage-bird.—Sandwich sparrow, a variety of the common savanna-sparrow found in Alaska.—White-throated sparrow, a crown-sparrow. (See also field-sparrow, hedge-sparrow, hill-sparrow, house sparrow, reed-sparrow, satin-sparrow, water-sparrow, and other compounds noted in def. 2.)

sparrow-bill (spar'ô-bil), n. 1. The bill of a sparrow.—2. A kind of shoe-nail: the original form of sparable.

Hob-nails to serve the man i' th' moone,
 And sparrowbills to cloute Pan's shooene.

Dekker, London's Tempe.

sparrowblet (spar'ô-bl), n. Same as sparrow-bill, 2, sparable.

sparrow-grass (spar'ô-gräs), n. [A corruption, simulating sparrow + grass, of sparagrass, itself a corruption of sparagus for asparagus.] Asparagus. [Prov. or vulgar.]—French sparrow-grass, the sprouts of the spiked star-of-Bethlehem, Ornithogalum Pyrenaicum, sold to be eaten as asparagus. Prior, Popular Names of British Plants. [Prov. Eng.]

sparrow-hawk (spar'ô-häk), n. [Also contr. sparhawk; < ME. spar-hawk, sperhawk, < AS. spearhafoc, spearhabuc, spearhabuc (= Icel. sparrhaukr = Sw. sparfhök = Dan. spurvehög), < spearwa, sparrow, + hafoc, hawk: see sparrow and hawk<sup>1</sup>. For the D., G., and Rom. names for 'sparrow-hawk,' see under sparrow.] 1. One of several small hawks which prey on sparrows and other small birds. (a) A hawk of the genus Accipiter or Nisus. In Great Britain the name is appropriated to A. nisus, or Nisus fringillarius, about 12 inches long, closely related to the sharp-shinned hawk of America. (b) In the United States, a hawk of the genus Falco and subgenus Tinnunculus, especially F. (T.) sparverius, which abounds in nearly all parts of the country, and is known in books as the rusty-crowned falcon and prairie-hawk. It is 10 or 11 inches long, and from 20 to 23 in extent of wings. The adult is ashy-blue on the crown, with a chestnut spot; on the back cinnamon-rufous, the male having few black marks or none, and the female numerous black bars. The wing-coverts in the male are ashy-blue, usually spotted with black; in the female cinnamon barred with black. The tail is bright-chestnut in the male with a broad subterminal black band, and the outer feathers mostly white with black bars; in the female barred throughout with black. The under parts are white, variously tinted with buff or tawny, in the male with few black spots if any; in the female with many dark-brown stripes. The bill is dark horn-blue; the cere and feet are yellow or orange. It is an elegant and spirited falcon, breeding in hollows of trees, building no nest, but often taking possession of a woodpecker's hole. The female lays five, six, or seven subepheroidal eggs,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  inches long by  $1\frac{1}{4}$  inches broad, of a buffy or pale yellowish ground-color, spotted and splashed all over with dark brown. Several similar sparrow-hawks inhabit America, and various other species, of both the genera named, are found in most parts of the world.

European Sparrow-hawk (Accipiter nisus).

American Sparrow-hawk (Falco sparverius), adult male.

2. In silver-working, a small anvil with two horns (one flat-sided and pyramidal, the other conical in form), held between the knees of the workman, for use in flanging, making bezels, etc.

sparrow-owl (spar'ô-owl), n. Any one of many small owls of the genus Glaucidium. Two occur in western parts of the United States, G. gnoma, the gnome-owl, and G. ferrugineum. See cut under Glaucidium.

sparrow-tail (spar'ô-tail), n. and a. 1. n. Something formed like a sparrow's tail; a swallow-tail.

These long-tailed coats [in 1786] . . . were cut away in front to a sparrow-tail behind. Fairholt, Costume, I. 401.

II. a. Having a long skirt cut away at the sides and squared off at the end: as, a sparrow-tail coat (now usually called swallow-tail).

The lawyers in their blue sparrow-tail coats with brass buttons, which constituted them [about 1840] a kind of professional uniform, moved about with as much animation as noisy jay-birds. E. Eggleston, The Graysons, xxvi.

sparrow-tongue (spar'ô-tung), n. The knot-grass, Polygonum ariculare.

sparrowwort (spar'ô-wört), n. 1. Any plant of the genus Passerina.—2. A South African species of heath, Erica Passerina.

sparry (spär'i), a. [spare + -y.] Resembling spar; consisting of or abounding with spar; spatiose.

As the rude cavern's sparry slides

When past the miner's taper glides. J. Baillie.

The rock . . . is a sparry iron ore, which turns reddish brown on exposure to the weather.

J. Croft, Climate and Time, p. 303.

Sparry iron, sparry iron ore, n. carbonate of iron: same as siderite, 2. The clay-ironstones, or the clay-lands and black-bands of the coal and other formations, belong to this family of iron ores.

sparsate (spär'sät), a. [spare + -ate.] In entom., thinly scattered; sparse: as, sparsate punctures. [Rare.]

sparse (spärs), a. [OF. espars, F. épars = Pg. espars, scattered, < L. sparsus, pp. of spargere, scatter, sprinkle (> It. spargere = Sp. esparcir = Pg. esparcir, scatter): see sparge. Cf. sparsc, v., spersc, disperse.] 1. Thinly scattered; dispersed round about; existing at considerable intervals; as used of population or the like, not dense. [Sparse has been regarded, falsely, as an Americanism, and has been objected to as being exactly equivalent to scattered, and therefore unnecessary. As a merely qualifying adjective, however, it is free from the possible ambiguity inherent in the participial form and consequent verbal implication of scattered.]

A sparse remnant of yellow leaves falling slowly athwart the dark overgrowth. George Eliot, Middlemarch, ix.

The sparse populations of new districts.

Sir C. W. Dilke, Probs. of Greater Britain, II. 1. Halley . . . was one of the first to discuss the possible luminosity of sparse masses of matter in space.

Nineteenth Century, XXVI. 768.

2. In bot., scattered; placed distantly or irregularly without any apparent or regular order: applied to branches, leaves, peduncles, etc.—3. In zool., spare or remote, as spots or other markings; scattered irregularly; few or scanty, as hairs or other appendages.

sparsel (spärs), v. t. [OF. esparsier, esparcer, < L. sparsus, pp. of spargere, scatter: see spare, a. Cf. spersc, disperse, sparge.] To disperse; scatter.

As when the hollow flood of air in Zephires cheeks doth swell,

And sparseth all the gathered clouds.

Chapman, Illad, xl. 263.

He [God] opens his hand wide, he sparseth abroad his blessings, and fills all things living with his plenteousness.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, II. 418.

sparsely (spärs'li), adv. 1. In a scattered or sparse manner; scantily; widely apart, as regards population, etc.; thinly.

The country between Trinity river and the Mississippi is sparsely settled, containing less than one inhabitant to the square mile.

Olney, Texas, p. 305.

2. In bot. and zool., so as to be sparso, thin, few, or scanty; sparoly or sparingly. See sparsc, a., 2, 3.

sparseness (spärs'nes), n. The state of being sparso; scattered condition; wide separation: as, sparseness of population.

The sparseness of the wires in the magnet coils and the use of the single cup battery were to me . . . obvious marks of defect.

The Century, XXXV. 331.

sparsile (spär'sil), a. [LL. sparsilis, < L. sparsus, pp. of spargere, scatter: see spare.] Scattered; sparse.—Sparsile star, in astron., a star not included in a constellation-figure.

sparsity (spär'si-ti), n. [spare + -ity.] The state of being sparso or scattered about; freedom from closeness or compactness; relative fewness.

At receptions where the sparsity of the company permits the lady of the house to be seen, she is commonly visible on a sofa, surrounded by visitors in a half-circle.

Howell, Venetian Life, xxi.

spart (spärt), n. [= F. sparte = Sp. Pg. esparto = It. sparto, < L. spartum, < Gr. σπάρτον, Spanish broom; a particular use of σπάρτον, a rope, cable; cf. σπάρτον, a rope. Cf. esparto.] 1. A plant of the broom kind; broom.

The nature of spart or Spanish broom.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, bk. xix. (Davies.)

2. A rush, Juncus articulatus, and other species. [Prov. Eug.]

spartaite (spär'tä-it), n. [Sparta (see def.) + -ite.] A variety of calcite or calcium carbonate, containing some manganese. It is found in Sparta, Sterling Hill, New Jersey.

Spartan (spär'tan), a. and n. [L. Spartanus, < Spurta, < Gr. Σπάρτη, Sparta, Laedæmon.] 1. a. 1. Of or pertaining to Sparta or Laedæmon, the capital of Laconia, or the ancient kingdom of Sparta or Laedæmon (Laconia), in the Peloponnesus; Laedæmonian; specifically, belonging to the branch of the ancient Dorian race dominant in Laconia.—2. Noting characteristics distinctive of, or considered as distinctive of, the ancient Spartans.

Lycæus . . . sent the Poet Thebes from Crete to prepare and mollify the Spartan surliness with his smooth songs and odes, the better to plant among them law and civility.

Milton, Areopagitica.

Spartan dog, n. bloodhound; hence, a cruel or blood-thirsty person.

O Spartan dog,

More fell than anguish, hunger, or the sen!

Shak., Othello, v. 2. 301.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Sparta or Laconia; a Laedæmonian; specifically (as opposed to Laedæmonian in a narrower sense), a member of that branch of the ancient Dorian race which conquered Laconia and established the kingdom of Sparta, celebrated for its military success and prestige, due to the rigid discipline enforced upon all Spartans from early childhood; a Spartiate.

Spartanism (spär'tan-izm), n. [Spartan + -ism.] The distinguishing spirit or a characteristic practice or quality of the ancient Spartans. See Spartan.

sparteine (spär'tö-in), n. [Spartium + -ine.] A liquid alkaloid (C<sub>16</sub>H<sub>26</sub>N<sub>2</sub>) obtained from the common broom, Cytisus (Spartium) scoparius. In small doses (0.2 to .05 gram) it stimulates the action of the vagus, and is used medicinally in the form of the sulphate in place of digitalis; it acts more quickly than the latter drug, but not so powerfully.

sparterie (spär'ter-i), n. [F. sparterie, < Sp. esparteria, < esparto, Spanish grass, broom: see esparto, spart.] In com., a collective name for articles manufactured from esparto and its fiber, as mats, nets, cordage, and ropes.

spart-grass (spär't-gräs), n. Same as spart, 2; also, a cord-grass, Spartina stricta. Britten and Holland, Eng. Plant Names.

sparth, n. [ME. sparth, sparthc, spertic, an ax, a battle-ax, < Irish. sparth, a kind of Irish ax; perhaps akin to lecel.] A battle-ax, or perhaps in some cases a mace.

He hath a sparth of twenty pound of wichte.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 1602.

At his saddle-girth he was a good steel spertic,

Full ten pound weight and more.

Scott, Eve of St. John.

Spartiate (spär'ti-ät), n. [F., < L. Spartiates, < Gr. Σπαρτιάτης, a Spartan, < σπάρτη, Sparta: see Spartan.] A citizen of Sparta; an ancient Laconian of the Dorian race. See Spartan.

Aristotle recognizes only one thousand families of the ancient Spartiates; and their landed possessions, the very groundwork of their state and its discipline, had in great measure passed into the hands of women.

Von Ranke, Univ. Hist. (trans.), p. 360.

Spartina (spär'ti-ni), n. [NL. (Von Schreber, 1789), so called from the tough leaves; < Gr. σπάρτιν, a cord, < σπάρτη, σπάρτον, a rope or cord.] A genus of grasses, of the tribe Panicææ. It is characterized by flowers with three glumes and a thread-shaped two-lobed style, grouped in dense one-sided commonly numerous and divergent panicle spikes with the rachis prolonged beyond the uppermost spikelet. There are 7 species, natives mostly of salt-marshes; one, S. stricta, is widely dispersed along the shores of America, Europe, and Africa; four others are found in the United States, one in South America beyond the tropics, and one in the islands of Tristan da Cunha, St. Paul, and Amsterdam. They are rigid reed-like grasses rising from a tufted or creeping base, with scaly rootstocks, very smooth sheaths, and long nonvoluble leaves sometimes flattened at the base. Book-names for the species are marsh-grass, cord-grass, and salt-grass; four of them are among the most conspicuous maritime grasses of the United States. S. polytachya, the largest species, a stately plant with a broad stiff panicle often of fifty spikes, is known locally on the coast as creek-thatch and creek-stuff, from its growth in creeks or inlets of salt water, and from its use, when cut, as a cover for stacks of salt-hay and as bedding in stables. (See also salt reed-grass, under reed-grass.) S. cynosuroides is the cord-grass of fresh-water lakes and rivers, smaller, attaining a height of about 6 feet; it occurs from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and in great quantities along the Mississippi; a superior brown wrapping-paper has been made from it. S. juncea, a low turf-forming species with diminutive three- to five-forked inflorescence, sometimes called rush salt-grass, covers large tracts of salt-marsh on the Atlantic coast, is recommended for binding wet sands, and yields a tough fiber from its leaves. S. stricta, the salt-marsh grass, with very different inflorescence, bears its numerous branches rigidly appressed into a single long and slender erect spike, or sometimes two, when it is called turf-spike grass. It is said to be also used as a durable tint; it is succulent and is eagerly eaten by cattle, imparting to their milk, butter, and flesh a strong rancid flavor locally known as a "thatchy" taste.

Spartium (spär'shi-um), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1737), < L. spartum, sparton, < Gr. σπάρτον, Spanish broom: see spart, esparto.] A genus of leguminous plants, of the tribe Genisteæ, type of the subtribe Sparticeæ. It is distinguished from the related genus Genista by a somewhat spathaceous calyx with very short teeth, by acuminate and incurved keel-petals, and by a narrower pod. The only species, S. junceum, is a native of the Mediterranean region and of the Canary Islands, known as Spanish broom, now naturalized in various parts of tropical America and long cultivated in gardens. It is a shrub with numerous long, straight, rush-like branches, which are green, polished, and round—not angular like the similar branches of the Irish broom. They are commonly without leaves; when these are present, they are composed each of a single leaflet and are without stipules. The handsome pea-like flowers form terminal racemes; they are yellow, fragrant, and highly attractive to bees, and are the source of a yellow dye. The branches are used to make baskets and fasten vines in vineyards; they yield by maceration a fiber which is made into cord and thread, and in Italy and Spain into cloth. The seeds in small doses are diuretic and tonic; in large, emetic and cathartic.

spartel (spär'tö), n. Same as esparto.

spar-torpedo (spär'tör-pö'dö), n. A torpedo secured to the end of a spar, rigged outboard of a vessel, and arranged to be fired on coming into contact with another vessel. Sometimes called pole-torpedo.

Sparus (spä'r-us), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1766), < L. sparus, < Gr. σπάρος, a kind of fish, the gilt-head.] 1. The name-giving genus of Sparidae, whose longest-known representative is the gilt-head of Europe: used at first in a very comprehensive sense, embracing many heterogeneous species belonging to a number of modern families, but now restricted to the gilt-head and very closely related species, typical of the family Sparidae. See cut under porgy.—2. [L. c.] A fish of this or some related genus; a spar.

sparve (spärv), n. [A dial. form of sparrow, ult. < AS. spearca: see sparrow.] A sparrow: still locally applied to the hedge-sparrow, Acceator modularis. [Cornwall, Eng.]

sparvert (spär'ver), n. [Also esparver; early mod. E. also sparvier, sparviour, sperver, sparvill; < OF. esparvier, esprevier, the furniture of a bed; perhaps a transferred use of esparvier, esparvier, a sweep-net, which is a fig. use of esparvier, a sparrow-hawk: see sparrow, and cf. parilion, ult. < L. papilio (n-), a butterfly.] 1. The canopy of a bed, or the canopy and curtains taken together:

I will that my . . . daughter have the sparver of my bedde.

Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, App. A.

2. In her., a tent.

sparviour, n. Same as sparver.

sparwet, n. A Middle English form of sparrow.

sparyt (spär'i), a. [spare + -y.] Sparing.

Homer, being otherwise sparie enough in speaking of pictures and colours, yet commendeth the ships painted therewith.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxxiii. 7.

spasm (spazm), n. [Early mod. E. spasme; < F. spasme = Pr. cspasme = Sp. Pg. cspasmo = It. spasmo, spasmo, < L. spasmus, < Gr. σπασμός, also σπασμα, a spasm, < σπᾶν, draw, pull, pluck, tear, rend. Cf. span, space, from the same ult. root.] 1. Excessive muscular contraction. When this is persistent, it is called tonic spasm; when it consists of alternating contractions and relaxations, it is called clonic spasm. A spasm of one side of the body is called hemispasm; a spasm of some particular part, as one arm, or one side of the face, is called a monospasm.

2. In general, any sudden transitory movement of a convulsive character, voluntary or involuntary; an abnormally energetic action or phase of feeling; a wounding strain or effort:

as, a spasm of industry, of grief, of fright, etc.; a spasm of pain or of coughing.

The spasms of Nature are centuries and ages, and will tax the faith of short-lived men. Slowly, slowly the Avenger comes, but comes surely. Emerson, Fugitive Slave Law.

Bronchial spasm, the spasmodic contraction of the muscular coat of the bronchial tubes which is the essential element of asthma.—Carpopedal, clonic, cynic, hysterical, hysterical spasm. See the adjectives.—Functional spasm, a general term for the nervous disorders of artisans and writers, as writers' cramp, etc. Usually called occupation neurosis.—Habit spasm, a trick of winking, jerking the head, sudden brief grimacing, making a sudden short vocal noise, running out the tongue, and similar acts of half-voluntary aspect, occurring at intervals long or short. Also called habit chorea.—Inspiratory spasm, a spasmodic contraction of all or nearly all the inspiratory muscles.—Mobility spasm, tonic spasm of varying intensity in the various muscles of a part, causing slow, irregular movements of the part, especially conspicuous in the hands. Sometimes the movements are quick. In rare cases it comes on without preceding hemiplegia; it may then, as in other cases, be called athetosis. Also called, when following hemiplegia, spastic hemiplegia and post-hemiplegic chorea.—Nictitating spasm. See nictitate.—Nodding spasm. Same as salaam convulsion (which see, under salaam).—Retrocolic spasm. See retrocolic.—Saltatorial spasm, a form of clonic spasm of the legs, coming on when the patient attempts to walk, causing jumping movements.—Spasm of accommodation, spasm of the ciliary muscles, producing accommodation for near objects.—Spasm of the chest, angina pectoris.—Spasm of the glottis, spasmodic contraction of the laryngeal muscles such as to close the glottis. See child-croaking, and laryngismus stridulus (under laryngismus).—Tonic spasm. Same as tonic spasm.

spasmodical (spaz-mat'ik-ul), a. [< spasmodic + -al.] Same as spasmodic.

The Ligaments and Shews of my Love to you have been so strong that they were never yet subject to such spasmodical Shrinkings and Convulsions.

Howell, Letters, II. 20.

spasmatomancy (spaz-mū-tō-man-si), n. [< Gr. σπασματίζω, a spasm, + μαντεία, divination.] Divination from spasmodic or involuntary movements, as of the muscles, features, or limbs.

The treatises on physiognomy also contain occasional digressions on onychomancy, . . . spasmatomancy, etc. Lacy, Brit., XIX. 4.

spasmodic (spaz-mat'ik), a. and n. [= F. spasmodique = Sp. spasmodico = Pg. spasmodico = It. spasmodico, < *NL. *spasmodicus*, < Gr. σπασμωδης, σπασματίζω, convulsive, spasmodic, < σπασμός, σπασμα (spasm), + ειδος, form.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to, of the nature of, or characterized by spasm; affected by spasm or spasms; convulsive; as, spasmodic movements; spasmodic asthma; a spasmodic person.—2. Attended by or manifesting procedure by fits and starts; jerky; overstrained; high-strung; rhapsodical; as, spasmodic action or efforts; spasmodic utterance or literature.—Spasmodic asthma, true asthma caused by spasm of the bronchial tubes, as distinguished from other forms of paroxysmal dyspnea, as from heart disease.—Spasmodic cholera, Asiatic cholera with severe cramps.—Spasmodic croup. See croup.—Spasmodic school, a group of British authors of the middle of the nineteenth century, including Philip Bailey, George Gilfillan, and Alexander Smith, whose writings were considered to be distinguished by an overstrained and unnatural style. The name, however, properly has a much more extensive scope, being exemplified more or less in nearly all times and countries, both in literature and in art.

The so-called spasmodic school of poetry, whose peculiarities first gained for it a hasty reputation, and then, having suffered under closer critical examination, it almost as speedily dropped out of mind again.

Encyc. Brit., XXII. 172.

Spasmodic stricture, a stricture, as of the urethra, vagina, or rectum, caused by spasmodic muscular contraction, and not permanent, or involving any organic lesion.—Spasmodic tubes, spastic paraplegia, or lateral sclerosis.

II. n. Same as antispasmodic. [Rare.]

spasmodical (spaz-mat'ik-ul), a. [< spasmodic + -al.] Same as spasmodic.

spasmodically (spaz-mat'ik-ul-i), adv. In a spasmodic manner; by fits and starts; by spasmodic action or procedure.

Gradual oscillations of the land are, in the long run, of far greater importance in the economy of nature than those abrupt movements which occur spasmodically.

Huxley, Physiological, p. 205.

spasmodist (spaz-mō-dist), n. [< spasmodic + -ist.] One who acts spasmodically; a person whose work is of a spasmodic character, or marked by an overstrained and unnatural manner. [Rare.]

De Meyer and the rest of the spasmodists [in music].

Poe, Marginalia, xxxvii. (Dartes.)

spasmodology (spaz-mol'ō-jī), n. [< Gr. σπασμωδης, a spasm, + -λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] In pathol., scientific knowledge of spasms.

spasmodotoxin (spaz-mō-tōk'sin), n. [< Gr. σπασμωδης, a spasm, + Ε. τοξίνη.] A toxin of unknown composition, obtained by Brieger in 1887 from cultures of bacilli of tetani.

spasmus (spas'mus), n. [L.: see spasm.] Spasm.—Spasmus nutans. Same as salaam convulsion (which see, under salaam).

spastic (spas'tik), a. [< Gr. σπαστικός, drawing, pulling, stretching, < σπῆναι, draw, pull: see spasm.] 1. In med., pertaining or relating to spasm; spasmodic: as, spastic contractions; spastic remedies.—2. In zool., convulsive, as an infusorian; or of pertaining to the Spastica.—Spastic albuminuria, albuminuria dependent upon a convulsive attack.—Spastic anemia, local anemia or ischemia from spastic contraction of the arteries of the part.—Spastic hemiplegia, mobile spasm following hemiplegia. See under spasm.—Spastic infantile paralysis. See paralysis.—Spastic paralysis, paralysis with muscular rigidity and increase of reflexes.—Spastic spinal paralysis, spastic pseudoparalysis, spastic pseudoparesis. See paralysis.

Spastica (spas'ti-kā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σπαστικός, drawing, pulling, stretching: see spastic.] In Porty's system of classification, a division of ciliato infusorians, containing those which contract and elunge form with a jerk. There were 4 families.—Urcularina, Ophrydina, Vorticellina, and Vaginifera.

spastically (spas'ti-kāl-i), adv. In a spastic manner.

spasticity (spas'tis'i-ti), n. [< spastic + -ity.] 1. A state of spasm.—2. Tendency to or capability of suffering spasm.

spati (spat), n. [A var. of spot.] A spot; stain; place. [Scotch.]

spat (spat), v. t.; pret. and pp. spatted, ppr. spatting. [A var. of spot, prob. in part < D. spalten, spot: see spot. Cf. spatter.] To spatter; defile.

Thy mind is spotted, spatted, spilt;

Thy soul is soiled with sin.

Kendall, Flowers of Epigrammes (1577). (Nares.)

spat (spat), n. [Prob., like the similar D. spat, a speck, spot, = Sw. spott, spittle, etc. (see spot), from the root of spit (cf. spat): see spit.] The spawn of shell-fish; specifically, the spawn of the oyster; also, a young oyster, or young oysters collectively, up to about the time of their becoming set, or fixed to some support. See spawn, n., 2.

Oyster spat may be reared from artificially fertilized eggs. The American, VII. 75.

spat (spat), v.; pret. and pp. spatted, ppr. spatting. [< spat, n.] I. intrans. To spawn, as an oyster; shed spat.

The surfaces upon which spatting occurs must be kept as free as possible from sediment and organic growths. Science, VI. 465.

II. trans. To shed or emit (spawn), as an oyster.

spat (spat), n. [In the sense 'blow' (def. 1), cf. spot; in part prob. imitative, like pat.] 1. A light blow or slap. [Local.]—2. A large drop; a spatter: as, two or three spats of rain fell.—3. A petty contest; a little quarrel or dissension. [U. S.]

They was pretty apt to have spats.

H. B. Storer, Orlowtown, p. 33.

spat (spat), v.; pret. and pp. spatted, ppr. spatting. [< spat, n.] I. trans. To give a light blow to, especially with the flat of the hand; strike lightly; slap: as, to spat dough; to spat one's hands together.

The little Isabel leaped up and down, spatting her hands.

S. Judd, Margaret.

II. intrans. To engage in a trivial quarrel or dispute; have a petty contest. [U. S.]

spat (spat), n. A preterit of spit.

spat (spat), n. [Also spatt; usually or only in pl. spats, spatts; abbr. of spatterdash.] A gaffer or legging. [Scotland and North of England.]

Cloth garters seem to have revived, after about thirty years of disuse, and are now called spats.

N. and Q., 7th ser., VI. 87.

A pair of black spats covering broad flat feet.

N. Macleod, The Starling, III.

Spatangida (spā-tan'jī-dī), n. pl. [NL., < Spatangus + -ida.] The spatangoid sea-urchins, as distinguished from Clypeastrida. See Spatangoida.

Spatangida (spā-tan'jī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spatangus + -ida.] A family of irregular sea-urchins, typified by the genus Spatangus; the heart-urchins. The mouth is eccentric, transverse, or reniform, and without dentary apparatus; there are petaloid ambulacra, of which the anterior one is unpaired; scutella or fascicles are always present; and the figure is oval or cordate. This is the leading family of the order, divided mainly by the characters of the ambulacra and scutella into several subfamilies (some of which rank as separate families with some authors), as Anachytinae, Brissinae, Leskeinae, and others. See cuts under Spatangoida and Spatangus, with others there noted. Also called Brissida.

Spatangina (spat-an'jī-nī), n. pl. [NL., < Spatangus + -ina.] 1. The spatangoid sea-urchins, as an order of petalostichous echinoids contrasted with Clypeastrina.—2. Same as Spatanginae.

Spatanginae (spat-an'jī-nō), n. pl. [NL., < Spatangus + -inae.] One of several subfamilies of Spatangida, including the genus Spatangus and closely related forms, as Lorenina, Brycinia, etc.

spatangite (spā-tan'jit), n. [< Spatangus + -ite.] A fossil spatangoid. See Dysasteridae, and cut under Anachytinae.

spatangoid (spā-tang'goid), a. and n. [< Spatangus + -oid.] I. a. Resembling a heart-urchin; related to Spatangus; or of pertaining to the Spatangida in a broad sense.

II. n. A spatangoid sea-urchin; a heart-urchin.

Spatangoida, Spatangoidea (spat-ang-goi'dī, -dē-jī), n. pl. [NL.: see spatangoid.] The Spatangida, in a broad sense, as an order of petalostichous sea-urchins; synonymous in some uses with Petalosticha, but usually restricted to exclude the elypeustroids or flat sea-urchins; then also called Spatangida and Spatangina.

The forms are numerous; most of them fall in the family Spatangidae as usually limited, from which the Cassidulidae are distinguished by the absence of scutella and other approaches to the regular sea-urchin.

The form of the spatangoids is various, and only a part of them have a cordate figure. Some are quite elongate, and may even bear a sort of beak or rostrum, as in the genus Pourtalesia. The tendency is away from radially and toward a sort of bilateral symmetry, as evidenced by the disposition of five ambulacra in two groups, an anterior trivium—under the odd ambulacrum of which is the mouth—and a posterior bivium, in relation with which is the anus. The odd anterior ambulacrum often aborts, leaving apparently but four ambulacra on the upper surface; in other cases it is disproportionately enlarged. The ambulacra are always petaloid; scutella are not recognized outside this group, and occur nearly throughout it (but not in Cassidulidae and the fossil Dynasteridae); the spines are very variable, and few or many, but always slender or fine, sometimes like hairs of great length. The genital and ocular plates are centric; there are no pollen vesicles, and four kinds of pedicels or tubercles occur, of which the scutella are always different from the two or three kinds of ambulacral feet. See cuts under Anachytinae, Echinocardium, Petalostichus, scutella, and Spatangus.

Spatangus (spā-tang'gus), n. [NL., < Gr. σπαστικός, a sea-urchin.] 1. The representative genus of the family Spatangidae, and a type form of the irregular sea-urchins called Spatangoida.—2. [I. c.] A species of this genus: as, the violet spatangus, S. purpureus.

spatch-cock (spach'kok), n. [Usually supposed to stand for **despatch-cock*, meaning 'a cock quickly done'; but such a formation is irregular, and no record of it exists. There is prob. some confusion with spitcheck, q. v.] A fowl killed and immediately broiled, as for some sudden occasion. [Colloq., Eng.]

spate (spāt), n. [Also spait, spat; uppar. < Ir. speid, a great river-flood.] A natural outpour of water; a flood; specifically, a sudden flood or freshet, as from a swollen river or lake. [Originally Scotch.]

Down the water w/ speed she runs,

While tears in spats for fast her ice.

Jack o' the Side (Child's Ballads, VI. 82).

Mr. Scrope held that while spawning-beds are swept away by spates on the whole.

Quarterly Rev., CXXVI. 361.

The Avon . . . running yellow in spate, with the recent heavy rains.

W. Black, House-boat, xix.

spate-bone, n. Same as spate-bone.

Some afterwards set up on a window a painted Mastiff-dog gnawing the spate-bone of a shoulder of mutton.

Fuller, Ch. Hist., V. i. 32. (Dartes.)

Amphidontus cordatus (or Echinocardium cordatum), one of the Spatangoida, viewed from above. a, anterior ambulacrum, forming with b, c, d, e, f, the trivium; g, h, two posterolateral ambulacra, forming the bivium; i, madreporic tubercle surrounded by genital pores; j, intrapetaloal scutella; k, fascicle; l, circumanal scutella.

Violet Spatangus (S. purpureus). One half shown with its spines removed.

spatha (spā'thū), n.; pl. spathæ (-thē). [L. spatha, < Gr. σπάθη, a broad flat blade, a broadsword: see spathe.] 1. A broadsword, thin, pointed, and double-edged, such as was used by the Franks and kindred peoples.

The British swords, called spathe, were large, long, and heavy. Encyc. Brit., IX. 69.

2. In bot., same as spathe.

spathaceous (spā-thū'shius), a. [L. spathe + -aceus.] In bot., spathe-bearing; furnished with or of the nature of a spathe.

spathal (spā'thāl), a. [L. spathe + -al.] In bot., inclosed in or furnished with a spathe: as, spathal flowers.

spathe (spā'thē), n. [L. spatha, < Gr. σπάθη, a broad flat blade, a broadsword, a broad rib, the shoulder-blade, the stem of a leaf, the spathe of a flower, a spatula. Hence ult. (< Gr.) E. spade, spade, spatula, spatule, spatle, spaddle, spittle, etc.] 1. In bot., a peculiar often large and colored bract, or pair of bracts, which subtend or envelop a spadix, as in palms and arums. The name is also given to the peculiar seven-lobed involucre of irises and allied plants. See spadix, 1, and cuts under Araceæ, Indian turnip (under Indian), Monstera, Peltandra, and Symplocarpus. 2. In zool., some spatulate or spoon-shaped part.

spathebill (spā'thē-bil), n. The spoon-billed sandpiper, Euryorhynchus pygmaeus. G. Cuvier (trans.). See cut under Euryorhynchus.

spathed (spā'thēd), a. [L. spathe + -ed.] In bot., surrounded or furnished with a spathe; spatheaceous.

Spathogaster (spā'thō-gās'tēr), n. [NL. (Hartig, 1810), < Gr. σπάθη, a blade, and γαστήρ, the stomach.] 1. A spurious genus of hymenopterous gall-insects, containing dimorphic forms of Neuroterus, the name being retained as distinctive of such forms. — 2. A genus of syrphid flies. Schiner, 1863. Also Spathogaster (Schiner, 1862), Spathogaster (Loew, 1843), Spazigaster and Spazogaster (Rondani, 1843).

spathegastic (spā'thē-gās'trik), a. [L. Spathogaster + -ic.] Pertaining to Spathogaster (sense 1): as, a spathegastic form.

Spathella (spā'thē-lī-ā), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1752), perhaps so called from its resemblance to a palm-tree; < Gr. σπάθη, a blade, spathe, petiole of a palm-tree: see spathe.] A genus of polypetalous trees, of the order Simarubaceæ and tribe Pieramnieæ. It is characterized by polygamous flowers without the disk usually present in the order, five stamens alternate to the petals, and a three-angled ovary with two pendulous ovules in each of its three cells. There are 3 species, natives of the West Indies, extending perhaps into Mexico. They are lofty and handsome trees with an erect unbranched trunk, destitute of the bitter principle which pervades Pieramnia, the next related genus, and many others of the order, and in many respects, as in the ovary, resembling Bonellia, the frankincense-tree, of the order Burseraceæ. They bear odd-pinnate alternate leaves, composed of numerous linear-oblong or sickle-shaped leaflets with a toothed or gland-bearing margin, and cymose clusters of red short-pedicelled flowers, disposed in elongated terminal panicles. The fruit is a somewhat elliptical three-angled and three-winged drupe, with a three-celled and three-seeded stone perforated with resin-bearing canals. S. simplex is the mountain-pride or mountain-green of the West Indies, a handsome tree with slender trunk rising from 20 to 60 feet, its leaves and its powdery inflorescence each several feet long.

spathic (spā'thik), a. [G. spath, spar (see spad), + -ic.] In mineral., having an oven lamellar or flatly foliated structure. — Spathic iron, spathic iron ore, carbonate of iron: same as siderite, 2.

spathiform (spā'thī-fōrm), a. [G. spath, spar, + L. forma, form.] Resembling spar in form: as, the ocherous and spathiform varieties of uranite.

spathilla (spā'thī-lī-ā), n.; pl. spathillæ (-ē). [NL., dim. of spatha, a spathe: see spathe. Cf. spathella.] In bot., a secondary or diminutive spathe in a spatheaceous inflorescence, as in palms. Also, sometimes, spathella.

When the spadix is compound or branching, as in Palms, there are smaller spathæ, surrounding separate parts of the inflorescence, to which the name spathilla has sometimes been given. Encyc. Brit., IV. 120.

spathing (spā'thīng), n. Same as spaying.

spathiopyrite (spā'thī-ō-pī'rīt), n. [G. σπάθιον, dim. of σπάθη, a broad blade, + E. pyrite.] Same as safflorite.

spathose (spā'thōs), a. [L. spathe + -ose.] In bot., relating to or formed like a spathe; spatheaceous; spathal.

spathose (spā'thōs), a. [G. spath, spar (see spathe), + -ose.] In mineral., sparry; of the nature of spar; occurring in broad plates or lamellæ; foliated in texture. — Spathose iron, spathic iron.

spathous (spā'thūs), a. [L. spathe + -ous.] In bot., same as spatheaceous.

spathulate (spā'thū-lāt), a. Same as spatulate.

Spathulea (spā'thū-lē-ā), n. Same as Spatula, 3.

Spathura (spā'thū-rī), n. [NL. (Gould, 1850), < Gr. σπάθη, a blade, + οὐρά, a tail.] A remarkable genus of Trochilidæ, containing hummingbirds with the lateral tail-feathers long-oxserted, narrowed, and then dilated into a spatule or racket at the end, and with conspicuous leg-muffs. There are 4 or 5 species, as S. underwoodi, also called Steganurus spatuligera. Spatial (spā'shāl), a. [Also spacial; < L. spatium, space: see space.] Of, pertaining to, or relating to space; existing in or connected with space.

Racket-tailed Hummingbird (Spathura underwoodi).

We have an intuition of objects in space: that is, we contemplate objects as made up of spatial parts, and apprehend their spatial relations by the same act by which we apprehend the objects themselves.

Whewell, Philos. of Inductive Sciences, I. p. xx. The ascertaining of a fixed spatial order among objects supposes that certain objects are at rest or occupy the same position. J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 160.

To analyze the United States of America as a spatial extent. H. N. Day, Logic, p. 176.

Spatiality (spā'shī-āl'ī-tī), n. [Also spaciality; < spatial + -ity.] Spatial character; extension.

So far, all we have established or sought to establish is the existence of the vague form or quale of spatiality as an inseparable element bound up with the other qualitative peculiarities of each and every one of our sensations. W. James, Mind, XII. 10.

Spatially (spā'shāl-ī), adv. Having reference to or as regards space. Also written spacially.

Usually we have more trouble to discriminate the quality of an impression than to fix it spatially. J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 62.

Objects of different sense-organs, experienced together, do not in the first instance appear either inside or alongside or far outside of each other, neither spatially continuous nor discontinuous, in any definite sense of these words. W. James, Prin. of Psychol., II. 181.

spatiatē (spā'shī-īt), v. i. [L. spatiat, pp. of spatiari (> G. spazierein), walk about, go, proceed, < spatium, room, space: see spare. Cf. cratiatē.] To rove; ramble; expatiate.

Confined to a narrow chamber, he could spatiatē at large through the whole universe. Bentley.

spatilomancy (spā'tīl'ō-man-sī), n. [G. σπαρίση, excrement, + μαντεία, divination.] Divination by means of animal excrements and refuse.

spatioust, a. An obsolete spelling of spacious.

spatt, n. See spat.

spatter (spat'er), v. [Freq. of spat, or, with variation, of spot: see spat, spot.] 1. trans. 1. To scatter or throw about carelessly, as some fluid or semi-fluid substance; dash or splash so as to fall in spreading drops or small quantities: as, to spatter water or mud over a person; to spatter oaths or calumnies.

Where famish'd dogs, late guardians of my door, Shall lick their mangled master's spotted gore. Pope, Iliad, xxi. 67.

2. To dash or splash upon; bespatter, literally or figuratively: as, to spatter a person with water, mud, or slander.

Reynard, close attended at his heels By panting dog, tir'd man, and spatter'd horse. Cooper, Needless Alarm, I. 125.

II. intrans. 1. To sputter; act or talk in a sputtering manner.

The grave spatter'd and shook his head, saying, 'Twas the greatest Error he had committed since he knew what belonged to a Soldier. Howell, Letters, I. iv. 16.

That mind must needs be irrecoverably deprav'd which, either by chance or impertinently tasting but once of one such deed, spatters at it, and abhors the relish ever after. Milton, Eklogikastes, II.

2. To undergo or cause scattering or splashing in drops or small quantities.

The colour spatters in fine drops upon the surface of the buttons. Spons' Encyc. Manuf., I. 562.

spatter (spat'er), n. [L. spat, v.] 1. The act of spattering, or the state of being spattered; a spattering or splashing effect.

She . . . sometimes exposed her face to the chill spatter of the wind. Hawthorne, Seven Gables, xvii.

2. A quick succession of not very loud sounds, such as is produced by the spattering of some substance.

A spatter of musketry was heard, which proceeded from the last of the enemy leaving the place. W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II. 378.

3. That which is spattered; a small splash, as of something thrown or falling in drops: as, a spatter of milk, ink, or mud on one's clothes.

The sun dripped through In spatters of wasted gold. St. Nicholas, XVIII. 287.

spatterdash (spat'er-dash), n. [L. spat + dash.] A covering for the legs, used to protect the stockings, trousers, etc., from mud and wear. In modern military uniform the name is applied to several kinds of gaiters, and to the water-proof leggings or shields to the trousers of some French mounted troops. Also spatterdash.

Here's a fellow made for a soldier: there's a leg for a spatterdash, with an eye like the King of Prussia. Sheridan (3), The Camp, I. 2.

spatterdock (spat'er-dok), n. The yellow pond-lily, Nymphaea (Nuphar) advena; also extended to other species of the genus. See Nymphaea, 1, and pond-lily, 1. [U. S.] spatterwork (spat'er-wérk), n. A method of producing a figure or design upon a surface of any kind by spattering coloring matter upon the exposed parts of it; any work or object, or objects collectively, showing an effect so produced.

spattle (spat'i), n. [L. ME. spatle, spottle, spatle, spoil, spotele, later spatyl (= OFries. spadel, spella), < AS. spall, spittle, < spātum, spit: see spit. Cf. spittle.] Spittle. Ip. Bal.

No spette in to erthe, and mada clay of the spotte. Wyclif, John ix. 6.

spattle (spat'i), n. [Formerly also spatule; < OF. spatule, espatule, F. spatule = Sp. spatula = It. spatola, < L. spatula, spatula, a blade, spatula: see spatula.] Doublet of spatula, spittle. 1. A flat blade for stirring, mixing, or molding plastic powdered or liquid substances; a spatula. — 2. Specifically, in pottery, a tool for mottling a molded article with coloring matter.

spatting-machine (spat'ling-mā-shēn'), n. A machine, consisting of a reservoir with sieves through which the liquid is caused to fall to divide it into spray, for sprinkling a colored glaze to form party-colored ware.

spatula (spat'ū-lī), n. [L. spatula, also spatula, dim. of spatula, < Gr. σπάθη, a broad blade, a spatula, a paddle: see spade, spathe. Cf. spatule, spittle, spittle.] 1. A broad flat blade or strip of metal or wood, with unsharp-edged and a commonly rounded outer end (which may be spoon-shaped), and a handle: used for spreading, smoothing, scraping up, or stirring substances, comminuting powders, etc. Spatulas are usually set in handles like those of table-knives, and are of many shapes, sizes, and materials. Those used by druggists, painters, etc., are comparatively long and narrow, straight, and made of more or less flexible steel. Fresco-painters use a trowel-shaped or spoon-shaped spatula for spreading wax or mortar upon the surface which is to receive the painting.

2. [cap.] [NL. (Boie, 1822).] A genus of Anatidæ, having the bill much longer than the head or tarsus, twice as wide at the end as at the base, the two broadly rounded and spoon-shaped, with narrow prominent nail and numerous protrusive lamellæ; the shoveler-ducks or scoulers. The bill is short and pointed, of fourteen feathers. S. clypeata is the common shoveler (see cut under shoveler). S. rhynchotis is Australian, S. platalea is South American, S. capensis is South African, and S. variegata inhabits New Zealand. Also Rhynchospiza, Clypeata, and Spatulea. — Spatula mallei, in ornith., the flattened extremity of the handle of the mallets attached to theumbo of the membrana tympani. See cut under tympanic.

spatulamancy (spat'ū-lā-man-sī), n. [Prop. "spatulomancy", < L. spatula, a blade, + μαντεία, divination.] A method of divination by a sheep's shoulder-blade.

Spatulamancy (called in Scotland Silnneanch [divination]) by reading the spinal bone or the blade bone of a shoulder of mutton well scraped.

Ribton-Turner, Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 78.

spatular (spat'ū-lār), a. [< spatula + -ar3.] Like a spatula in form; spatulate.

Spatularia (spat'ū-lār'i-ā), n. [NL. (Shaw), < L. spatula, a spatula: see spatula.] In ichth., Skull of Spatularia, with the long beak removed, the anterior (ax) and posterior (px) semicircular canals exposed; Au, auditory chamber; Or, orbit of eye; N, nasal sac; Hy, hyoidian apparatus; R, representatives of branchiostegal rays; Op, operculum; Mn, mandible; A, suspensorium; D, pantoquadrate cartilage; E, maxilla.

a genus of ganoid fishes: same as Polyodon, 1. See also cut under paddle-fish.

Spatulariidae (spat'ū-lār'i-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spatularia + -idae.] In ichth., a family of ganoid fishes, named from the genus Spatularia: same as Polyodontidae. Also Spatulariidae. See cut under paddle-fish and Psephurus.

spatulate (spat'ū-lāt), a. [< NL. spatulatus, < spatula, a spatula: see spatula.] Shaped like a spatula; in zool. and anat., spoon-shaped, or rounded more or less like the outlines of a spoon; spatuliform; in bot., shaped like a spatula; resembling a spatula in shape, being oblong or rounded with a long narrow attenuate base: as, a spatulate leaf, petal, or other flattened organ. Also spatulate. See cut under Euryphorhynchus, paddle-fish, Parotia, Prioniturus, Spathura, and *shorelér*².

Spatulate leaves of Callitriche heterophylla.

The large basal joint of the sixth appendage [of Limulus] is almost devoid of spines, and bears a curved, spatulate process.

Rusley, Anat. Inverl., p. 223.

spatulation (spat'ū-lā'shon), n. [< spatulate + -ion.] Spatulate shape or formation; appearance as of a spatula; spoon-shaped figure or arrangement. See cut under spatulate.

The internal tail-feathers [of some humming-birds] may suddenly enlarge into a terminal spatulation, as in the forms known as "Maquet-tails." Encyc. Brit., XII, 359.

spatule (spat'ū), n. [< F. spatule, < L. spatula, a blade, spatula: see spatula.] 1. Same as *spatule*².

Stirring it thrice a day with a spatule.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxiii, 17.

2. In zool., a spatulate formation or spatuliform part; specifically, in ornith., the racket at the end of the tail-feathers, as of the motmots or sawbills and certain parakeets and humming-birds. See cut under Momotus, Prioniturus, and Spathura.

spatuliform (spat'ū-lī-fōrm), a. [< L. spatula, a blade, spatula, + form, form.] Spatulate in form; spoon-shaped.

spatuligerous (spat'ū-līj'e-rus), a. [< L. spatula, a blade, spatula, + gerere, carry.] In zool., bearing or provided with a spatule or racket.

spaud, v. A dialectal form of *spald*¹.

spauder (spá'dér), n. [Also spauder (f) (Sc. spelder), also spauder, spread; freq. of spaud, spul: see *spald*¹.] An injury to animals arising from their legs being forced too far asunder on ice or slippery roads. [Prov. Eng.]

spaul (spál), n. See *spall*². — Black spaul. Same as symptomatic anthrax (which see, under anthrax).

spauld, n. An obsolete variant of *spall*².

spave (spáv), v. t. A dialectal variant of *spay*¹.

spaviet (spav'i-et), a. A Scotch form of spavined.

My spaviet Pegasus will thup.

Burns, First Epistle to Davie.

spavin (spav'in), n. [Early mod. E. also sparen; < ME. spavene, < OF. espavent, esparrain, F. éparvin = Olt. spavaio, lt. spavenio = Sp. espaván = Pg. esparavão, esparvão, spavin; perhaps so called in allusion to the hopping or sparrow-like motion of a horse afflicted with spavin; cf. Sp. esparaván, a sparrow-hawk, < OHG. sparo, spawe = AS. spærwa = E. sparrow: see sparrow. But this explanation is uncertain, resting on the mere resemblance of form.] 1. A disease of horses affecting the hock-joint, or joint of the hind leg between the knee and the fetlock. See bog-spavin, blood-spavin, bone-spavin. — 2. In coal-mining, the clay underlying the coal. Also called under-clay, coal-clay, seat, seat-clay, etc. [Yorkshire, Eng.] spavined (spav'ind), a. [< spavin + -ed.] Affected with spavin; hence, figuratively, halting; crippled; very lame or limping.

A blind, spavined, galled hack, that was only fit to be put up for a dog-kennel.

Goldsmith, Vicar, xlv.

If they ever praised each other's bad drawings, or broken-winded novels, or spavined verses, nobody ever supposed it was from admiration.

O. H. Holmes, Autocrat, I.

spawt, n. An obsolete form of spa.

spawder, n. See spander.

spawl¹, n. and v. See *spall*¹.

spawl², n. See *spall*².

spawl³ (spál), n. [A contr. of *spattle*¹.] Saliva or spittle thrown out carelessly; slaver.

The new-born infant from the cradle takes,

And first of spittle she illustration makes;

Then in the spawl her middle finger dips.

Anoints the temples, forehead, and the lips.

Dryden, tr. of Versus's Satires, II.

spawl³ (spál), v. i. [Formerly also spall; *< spawl*³, n.] To throw saliva from the mouth so as to scatter it; eject spittle in a careless, dirty manner: sometimes with infinitive it.

There was such spawling and spalling, as though they had been half choked.

Harrington's Apology (1590). (Nares.)

In disgrace,

To spit and spawl upon his sunbright face.

Quarles, Emblems, III, 2.

Why must he sputter, spawl, and slaver it? Swift.

spawld, n. A Scotch variant of *spald*² for *spall*². spawn (spân), v. [Early mod. E. spawne; < ME. spawen, spawen, < OE. espawndre, espandre, also espawdr, shed, spill, pour out, spawn, same as espawir, blow, bloom as a flower, lit. expand, F. épandre, spread, = It. spandere, spill, scatter, shed, < L. expandere, spread out, shed abroad; see expand. Cf. spanning.] I. trans. To produce or lay (eggs): said of a female fish, and by extension of other animals; hence, to generate. It is sometimes applied, in contempt, to human beings.

What principles such principles as these may spawen, when they are laid out to the sun, you may determine.

Swift.

II. intrans. 1. To produce or lay eggs of the kinds called spawn, as a fish, frog, mollusk, or crustacean; by extension, to produce offspring: said of other animals, and, in contempt, of human beings.

The Trout usually spawens about October or November.

I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 75.

2. To issue, as the eggs or young of a fish: by extension applied to other animals, and to human beings, in contempt.

The beguiling charms of distinction and magnificent subtleties have spawnd into prodigious monsters, and the birth of error.

Locke, True Religion, II, 176.

It is so ill a quality, and the mother of so many ill ones that spawen from it, that a child should be brought up in the greatest abhorrence of it.

Locke.

spawn (spân), n. and a. [Early mod. E. spawne; < spawen, v.] I. n. 1. The eggs or ova of various oviparous animals, as amphibians, fishes, mollusks, crustaceans, etc., when small and numerous, or extruded in more or less coherent masses; female roe. The number of individual eggs in spawn varies much, and is sometimes prodigiously great: thus, it has been estimated that the spawn of a single codfish may contain several million eggs. In oviparous fishes the eggs are spawned directly into the water, fecundated as they flow out, or afterward, by the milk of the male, and left to hatch by themselves. Fish-spawn is also easily procured by the process of stripping the female, and artificially fecundated by the same process applied to the male, the spawn and milk being mixed together in the water of a vessel made for the purpose. In ovoviviparous fishes the spawn is impregnated in the body of the female, as is usual with the eggs of higher animals. Frogs and toads lay a quantity of spawn consisting of a jelly-like mass in which the eggs are embedded, and it is fertilized as it flows forth. Some shell-fish extrude spawn in firm gelatinous masses, as the common sea snail, Natica heros. (See land-snail.) The mass of eggs (called coral or berry) that a lobster carries under her tail is the spawn or roe of that crustacean; and in various other crustaceans and some fishes the spawn is carried to hatching in special brood-pouches (see opossum-skrimp), which are sometimes in the male instead of the female, as in the sea-horse (see Hippocampus). Andromon fishes are those which leave the sea and run up rivers to spawn; a few fishes are catadromous, or the converse of this. The name spawn is seldom or never given to the eggs of scaly reptiles, birds, or mammals; but the term has sometimes included willt. See spawning.

2. The spat of the oyster, from the time of the discharge of the egg until the shell is visible and the creature has become attached. — 3. Offspring of fish; very small fish; fry. — 4.

Offspring in general; a swarming brood: applied, mostly in contempt, to human beings.

To Sem the East, to Cham the South, the West

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii, 'The Colonies, Arg.

How'er that common spawn of ignorance,

Our fry of writers, may beslime his fame.

B. Jonson, Poetaster, Ind.

5. In bot., the mycelium of fungi; the white fibrous matter forming the matrix from which fungi are produced. Certain species of edible fungi, as Agaricus campestris, are propagated artificially by sowing the spawn in prepared beds of horse-droppings and sand.

By this time these will be one mass of natural spawn, having a grey mouldy and thready appearance, and a smell like that of mushrooms.

Cooke and Berkeley, Fungi, p. 257.

The agarics have an abundant mycelium, known to gardeners as the spawn, consisting of white, cottony filaments, which spread in every direction through the soil.

Amer. Cyc., XII, 70.

To shoot spawn. See shoot.

II. a. Containing spawn; spawning, or about to spawn; ripe, as a fish.

spawn-brick (spân'brîk), n. In bot., brick-shaped masses of mold or compressed horse-droppings fermented with mushroom-spawn, and used for the artificial sowing or stocking of a mushroom-bed.

The [mushroom]-bed will be ready for spawning, which consists of inserting small pieces of spawn bricks into the sloping sides of the bed, about 6 inches asunder.

Encyc. Brit., XII, 284.

spawn-eater (spân'ē'tér), n. A spawn-eating fish, or other animal which habitually feeds upon spawn, to the detriment of the fisheries or of fish-culture; especially, a cyprinoid fish, Spawn-eater (Notropis hudsonius).

Notropis hudsonius, found in streams along the coast from New York to Virginia. This is one of the largest minnows, from 4 to 8 inches long, of a pale coloration, the sides with a broad silvery band, and usually a dusky spot at the base of the caudal fin. It is sometimes called smelt.

spawned (spând), p. a. 1. Having emitted spawn; spent, as a fish. — 2. Extruded or deposited, as spawn.

spawner (spân'ēr), n. [< spawn + -er.] 1. That which spawns, as the female of fish, frogs, oysters, etc.; a ripe fish about to spawn: correlated with miller.

There the Spawner casts her eggs, and the Melter hovers over her all that time that she is casting her spawn, but touches her not.

I. Walton, Complete Angler (ed. 1653), p. 117.

2. In fish-culture, a spawn-gatherer. [Recent.] spawn-fungus (spân'fing'gus), n. See fungus. spawn-hatcher (spân'hach'ér), n. An apparatus for the artificial hatching of the ova of fish. It consists essentially of a box, or a series of boxes, fitted with trays with perforated bottoms to receive the spawn, and arranged for the supply of a regulated current of fresh water.

spawning (spâ'ning), n. [Verbal n. of spawen, v.] The act or process of emitting and fecundating spawn. It consists essentially in the emission by the female of her eggs, and by the male of his milk, in such a manner that they may come in contact with each other, and that the eggs may be placed in a position favorable to their development. The manner, time, and place in which this is performed vary with the species. Some kinds bury their eggs in sand or gravel; some attach them to weeds, sticks, or stones; some build nests of stones or other material; and others drop their eggs carelessly through the water. Fish spawn at all seasons of the year, every species having its appropriate time. Rapid streams, quiet lakes, and sea-bottoms are among the places of deposit. In some cases nests are constructed somewhat elaborately. With the laying of the eggs the care of the parents for their offspring generally ends. Not unfrequently both sire and dam immediately devour their yet unhatched descendants. A few species guard their eggs during incubation, and in some rare cases this care continues after the young fishes are hatched.

spawning-bed (spân'ning-bed), n. A bed or nest made in the bottom of a stream, as by salmon and trout, in which fish deposit their spawn and willt.

spawning-ground (spân'ning-ground), n. A water-bottom on which fish deposit their spawn; hence, the body or extent of water to which they resort to spawn; a breeding-place.

spawning-screen (spá'ning-skreen), n. In fish-culture, a frame or screen on which the spawn of fish is collected.

spawn-rising (spán'ri'zing), n. In fish-culture, the increase in size of spawn after the milt has been added.

spay<sup>1</sup> (spá), v. t. [Early mod. E. also spaic; dial. spave, spaire, speave; supposed to be < Gael. spoth = Manx spoy = Bret. spachein, spaza, castrate, geld; cf. W. yspaddu, exhaust, empty, dyspyddu, drain, exhaust; perhaps connected with L. spado, < Gr. πάδος, a cunuch, < παύω, draw, extract: see spade<sup>1</sup>.] To castrate (a female) by extirpating the ovaries. The process corresponds to castration or emasculation of the male, incapacitating the female from breeding, or making her barren. Applied to hens, it corresponds to the castrating of a cock. It is also practised on other animals, as swine. The animals fatten more readily, and the flesh is improved. Compare Batley's operation, under operation.

spay<sup>2</sup> (spá), n. [Also spaic; perhaps < OF. espeis, espois, F. épois, branches of a stag's horns, < G. spitz, a point (cf. G. spitz-hirsch, a stag whose horns have begun to grow pointed): see spitz<sup>2</sup>, spitz. Cf. spittard, a two-year-old hart.] The male red-deer or hart in his third year.

Spea (spé'á), n. [NL. (Cope, 1863), < Gr. σπῆα, a cave.] A genus of spade-footed toads (Scaphiopodidae or Pelobatidae), representing a low type of organization, and peculiar to America. Several species, as S. hammondi and S. bombifrons, inhabit arid regions in the western United States and Mexico, being adapted to dry climate by the rapidity of their metamorphosis. During rains in summer they come out of their holes in the ground, and lay their eggs in rain-pools, where the tadpoles are soon seen swimming. These get their legs very promptly, and go hopping about on dry land. They are very noisy in the spring, like the common spade-foot.

speak (spék), v.; pret. spoke (spake archaic or poetical), pp. spoken (spoke obs. or vulgar), ppr. speaking. [< ME. speken (pret. spake, spuk, spee, spwe, pp. spoken, spoke, earlier spaken, speokene, i-spoken, ispeke), < late AS. specan, earlier sprecan (pret. spæc, pl. spæcon, earlier spæræ, pl. spæræcon, pp. specen, earlier sprecen) = OS. sprecan = OFries. spreka = D. spreken = MLG. LG. spreken = OHG. sprehan, MHG. G. sprechen, speak; cf. MHG. spelten, chatter, G. dial. speliten, speak; root unknown. Hence ult. speech, and perhaps spook.] I. intrans. 1. To use articulate utterance in the tones of the speaking-voice, in distinction from those of the singing-voice; exert the faculty of speech in uttering words for the expression of thought.

Sire, ar hi heo [ere they be] to dlthe awreke
We mote here the children speke.

King Horn (E. E. T. S.), p. 69.
Their children spake half in the speech of Aslud, and could not speak in the Jews' language. Neli. xlii. 24.

Many good scholars speak but fumblingly.
B. Jonson, Discoveries.

2. To make an oral address, as before a magistrate, a tribunal, a public assembly, or a company; deliver a speech, discourse, argument, plea, or the like: as, to speak for or against a person or a cause in court or in a legislature.

Then Agrippa said unto Paul, Thou art permitted to speak for thyself. Acts xxvi. 1.

Lord Sandwich, by a most inconceivable jumble of cunning, spoke for the treaty. Walpole, Letters, II. 278.

3. To make oral communication or mention; talk; converse: as, to speak with a stranger; to speak of or about something; they do not speak to each other.

Than eche toke other be the hande, and wente spekyng of many thynges till thei com to the hostell of Vlín and Bretell.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), III. 467.

I must thank him only,
Lest my remembrance suffer ill report;
At heel of that, defy him. . . .
Would we had spoke together.
Shak., A. and C., II. 2. 167.

4. To communicate ideas by written or printed words; make mention or tell in recorded speech.

I speak concerning Christ and the church. Eph. v. 32.
The Scripture speaks only of those to whom it speaks.
Hammond.

The Latin convent is thought to have been on mount Gihon, though some seem to speak of that hill as beyond the pool of Gihon. Pococke, Description of the East, II. 1. 10.

5. To make communication by any intelligible sound, action, or indication; impart ideas or information by any means other than speech or writing; give expression or intimation.

And let the kettle to the trumpet speak,
The trumpet to the cannoneer without.
Shak., Hamlet, v. 2. 286.

That brow in furrow'd lines had fix'd at last,
And spake of passions, but of passion past.
Byron, Lara, i. 5.

Abate the stride, which speaks of man.
Tennyson, Princess, II.

6. Of an organ-pipe, to emit or utter a tone; sound.—7. Naut., to make a stirring and lapping sound in driving through the water: said of a ship.

At length the sniffer reached us, and the sharp little vessel began to speak, as the rushing sound through the water is called; while the wind sang like an Eolian harp through the taut weather-rigging.

M. Scott, Tom Cringle's Log, vii.

8. To bark when ordered: said of dogs.—III spoken. See well or ill spoken, below.—Properly speaking. See properly.—So to speak. See sol.—Speaking acquaintance. (a) A degree of acquaintance extending only to formal intercourse.

Between them and Mr. Wright [the Rector] there was only a speaking acquaintance.

Trollope, Belton Estate, I. 33.

(b) A person with whom one is only sufficiently acquainted to interchange formal salutations or indifferent conversation when meeting casually.—Speaking terms, a relation between persons in which they speak to or converse with each other; usually, an acquaintance limited to speaking in a general way or on indifferent subjects. Not to be on speaking terms is either to be not sufficiently acquainted for passing speech or salutation, or to be so much estranged through disagreement as to be debarr'd from it.

Our poorer gentry, who never went to town, and were probably not on speaking terms with two out of the five families whose parks lay within the distance of a drive.
George Eliot, Felix Holt, I.

To speak by the card. See card<sup>1</sup>.—To speak for. (a) To speak in behalf or in place of; state the case, claims, or views of.

The general and his wife are talking of it;
And she speaks for you stoutly.
Shak., Othello, III. 1. 47.

There surely I shall speak for mine own self.
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

(b) To afford an indication of; intimate; denote.

Every half mile some pretty farmhouse was shining red through clumps of trees, the many cattle-sheds speaking for the wealth of the owner. Froude, Sketches, p. 93.

To speak holiday. See holiday, a.—To speak in lutestring. See lutestring<sup>2</sup>.—To speak like a book. See book.—To speak of. (a) See def. 3. (b) To take or make account of; mention as notable or of consequence; deserve mention.

Those Countries nearest Tigris Spring,
In those first ages were most flourishing,
Most spoken of.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II., The Colonies.

Strangers . . . that pay to their own Lords the tenth, and not to the owner of those liberties any thing to speak of.
Capt. John Smith, Works, II. 244.

To speak out, to speak loud or louder; hence, to speak freely, boldly, or without reserve; disclose what one knows or thinks about a certain matter.—To speak to. (a) To answer for; attest; account for.

For a far longer time than they, the modern observatories, can directly speak to. Piazzi Smyth, Pyramid, p. 74.

(b) To admonish or rebuke. [Colloq. and euphemistic.]

"Papa," he exclaimed, in a loud, plaintive voice, as of one deeply injured, "will you speak to Giles? . . . If this sort of thing is allowed to go on, . . . it will perfectly ruin the independence of my character."
Jean Ingelow, Off the Skelligs, xix.

To speak to one's heart. See heart.—To speak up, to express one's thoughts freely, boldly, or unreservedly; speak out.

Speak up, jolly blade, never fear.

Robin Hood and Little John (Child's Ballads, V. 221).

To speak well for, to be a commendatory or favorable indication of or with regard to: as, his eagerness speaks well for him, or for his success. Well or ill spoken, given to speaking well or ill; given to using decorous or indecorous speech, in either a literal or a moral sense.

Thou speakest
In better phrase and matter than thou didst. . . .
Methinks you're better spoken. Shak., Lear, iv. 6. 10.
He was wise and discrete and well spoken, having a grave & deliberate utterance.

Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 413.

=Syn. Speak, Talk. Speak is more general in meaning than talk. Thus, a man may speak by uttering a single word, whereas to talk is to utter words consecutively: so a man may be able to speak without being able to talk. Speak is also more formal in meaning: as, to speak before an audience; while talk implies a conversational manner of speaking.

II. trans. 1. To utter orally and articulately; express with the voice; enunciate.

And thei seide, "That he is, for this thre dayes he spake no speche, ne neuer shall spoke worde."

Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 61.

1. One who speaks or utters words; one who talks or converses; one who makes a speech or an address; specifically, one who engages in or practises public speaking.

Thei seyn also that Abraham was Fren'd to God, and that Moyses was familee spekere with God.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 136.

Bearers far more strange of the Roman name, though no speakers of the Roman tongue, are there in special abundance.
E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 57.

2. A proclaimer; a publisher. [Rare.]

After my death I wish no other herald,
No other speaker of my living actions.
Shak., Hen. VIII., iv. 2. 70.

3. [cap.] The title of the presiding officer in the British House of Commons, in the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States, in the lower houses of State legislatures in the United States, and in British colonial legislatures; also of the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain as presiding officer of the House of Lords. The Speaker of the House of Commons is elected in each Parliament from its members, with the royal concurrence, generally without regard to politics, and may preside in successive Parliaments of opposite political character. His powers (which have been much diminished in the course of time) are limited to the preservation of order and the regulation of debate under the rules of the House, the use of the casting-vote in case of an equal division, and speaking in general committee. The Speaker in the House of Representatives (as also in the State legislatures) is usually a leader of the party having a majority of the members, and has, in addition to the powers of the British Speaker, the power of appointing all committees, and the right, as a member, of participating in general debate after calling another member to the chair, and of voting on all questions—rights exercised, however, only on important occasions. He is thus in a position to control the course of legislation to an important extent, and the office is consequently regarded as of great power and influence.

I hear that about twelve of the Lords met and had chosen my Lord Manchester speaker of the House of Lords. Pepps, Diary, April 20, 1660.

In the Lower House the Speaker of the Tudor reigns is in very much the same position as the Chancellor in the Upper House; he is the manager of business on the part of the crown, and probably the nominee of the king himself or of the chancellor.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 272. Not only that the Standing Committees are the most essential machinery of our governmental system, but also that the Speaker of the House of Representatives is the most powerful functionary of that system.

W. Wilson, Cong. Gov., p. 103. 4. A title, and hence a general name, for a book containing selections for practice in declamation, as at school. [U. S.] speakership (spē'kēr-shīp), n. [< speaker + -ship.] The office of Speaker in a legislative body.

speaking (spō'king), p. a. Adapted to inform or impress us if by speech; forcibly expressive or suggestive; animated or vivid in appearance: as, a speaking likeness; speaking gestures.

A representation borrowed, indeed, from the actual world, but closer to thought, more speaking and significant, more true than nature and life itself. J. Caird.

The smallness of Spalato, as compared with the greatness of ancient Salona, is a speaking historical lesson. L. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 172.

speaking demurrer, in law, a demurrer which alleges or suggests a fact which to be available would require evidence, and which therefore cannot avail on demurrer.

speakingly (spō'king-ly), adv. In a speaking manner; so as to produce the effect of speech; very expressively.

A Mute is one that speakingly, And yet says nothing. Brome, Antipodes, v. 4.

speaking-machine (spō'king-mā-shēn'), n. A mechanical contrivance for producing articulate sounds automatically; a speaking automaton.

Kempelen's and Kratzenstein's speaking-machine, in the latter part of the last century; the speaking-machine made by Fabermann of Vienna, closely imitating the human voice. Encyc. Brit., XV, 205.

speaking-trumpet (spō'king-trūm'pet), n. A trumpet-shaped instrument by which the sound of the human voice is reinforced so that it may be heard at a great distance or above other sounds, as in hailing ships at sea or giving orders at a fire. In the United States navy a speaking-trumpet is the badge of the officer of the deck at sea.

Speaking-trumpet. a, tube; b, bell; c, mouthpiece; d, rings for a band by which the trumpet may be attached to the person.

speaking-tube (spō'king-tūb), n. A tube of sheet-iron, gutta-percha, or other material, serving to convey the voice to a distance, as from one building to another, or from one part of a building to another, as from an upper floor to the street-door, or from the rooms of a hotel to the office. It is commonly used in connection with an annunciator, and is usually fitted at each end with a whistle for calling attention.

speaking-voice (spō'king-vois), n. The kind of voice used in speaking; opposed to singing-voice, or the kind of voice used in singing. The singing-voice and the speaking-voice differ in several respects: (a) in pitch and inflection, which are arbitrary in singing, but conformed to the thought in speaking; (b) in succession of tones, the tones of music being discrete, while those of speech are concrete; (c) in time and emphasis, which in music are more arbitrary and less conformed to the thought than in speech. So great is the difference that many persons who have a good voice for one use have a very poor voice for the other.

speal (spēl), n. Same as spell, spill.

speal, n. An obsolete variant of spall.

speal-bone (spēl'bōn), n. The shoulder-blade. —Reading the speal-bone, seapullman; divination by means of a shoulder-blade. L. B. Tylor, Prim. Cult., I, 125. Compare scapulomania.

spean (spēn), n. [< ME. spenc, < AS. spana, tent, udder; cf. spanan, wean: see spane.] An animal's tent. [Old and prov. Eng.]

It hath also four speanes to her paps.

Topsett, Four-footed Beasts, p. 38. (Halliwell.) spear (spēr), n. [*< ME. speere, pl. speeres, speeren, < AS. spere = OS. sper = OFries. sper, spiri = MD. spere, D. speer = MLG. sper, spere = OHG. MHG. sper, G. speer (> OF. espier) = Icel. spjör, pl. = Dan. spær, a spear (the L. sparus, a small missile weapon, dart, hunting-spear, is prob. < Tout.); perhaps akin to spar, a beam, bar: see sparl. In def. 7 prob. confused with spire.] 1. A weapon consisting of a penetrating head attached to a long shaft of wood, designed to be thrust by or launched from the hand at an enemy or at game. Spears have been used as warlike weapons from the earliest times, and were the principal reliance of many ancient armies, as those of the Greeks, who in others they were used cordially with the bow and the sword. They are represented by the bayonet in modern armies, though some use is still made of spears, of which javelins and lances are lighter, and pikes heavier, forms. Compare ants under bayonet and pike.*

Hunting-spear, 15th or 16th century.

When they were over, the smytyn In n-mongo hem so vigorously that oon myght here the crasshage of speers half a mylo longo. Martin (L. L. T. S.), II, 155.

They shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks. Isa. II, 4.

2. A man armed with a spear; a spearman.

Struck with n kulle's haft hard against the board, And call'd for flesh and wine to feed his spears. Tranyson, Gerald.

3. A sharp-pointed instrument with barbed tines, generally three or four, used for stabbing fish and other animals; a fish-gig.—4. An instrument like or suggestive of an actual spear, as some articles of domestic or mechanical use, one of the long pieces fixed transversely to the beam or body of chevaux-de-frise, in some parts of England a bee's sting, etc.—5. One of the pieces of timber which together form the main rod of the Cornish pumping-engine.—6. The feather of a horse. —Also called the streak of the spear. It is a mark in the neck or near the shoulder of some birds, which is reckoned a sure sign of a good horse.

7. A spire: now used only of the stalks of grasses: as, a spear of wheat.

Tell me the moles, dust, sands, and spears Of corn, when Summer shakes his ears. Herrick, To Lind God.

The spear or scepter of which church was fired by lightning. Lambart, Perambulation (1500), p. 257. (Halliwell.)

Holy spear. Same as holy lance. See lance. —Spear pyrites, a variety of uncrystallized. —Spear side, occasionally spear half, in phrase sometimes used to denote the main line of a family, in contradistinction to disgrace or spinster side (or half) the female line. See disgrace side, under disgrace.

A King who by the spindle side sprang from both William and Cerdic, but who by the spear-side had nothing to do with either. L. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, V, 162.

To sell under the spear, to sell by auction: from the ancient Roman practice of selling a spear (hasta) in the ground at an auction, originally as a sign of the sale of military booty.

My lords the senators Are sold for slaves, their wives for bondwomen, . . . And all their goods, under the spear, at outcry. B. Jonson, Cathline, II.

spear (spēr), v. [< spear, n.] 1. trans. To pierce or strike with a spear or similar weapon: as, to spear fish.

The [Australian] youngsters generally celebrated the birth of a lamb by *spear*ing it. C. Reade, Never too Late to Mend, II.

The spear is torn by the swallow, the sparrow spear'd by the shrike. Tranyson, Gerald, IV, 4.

II. intrans. To shoot into a long stem; germinate, as barley. See spire.

The single blade [of wheat] spears first into three, then into five or more side-shoots. Science, VII, 174.

spear (spēr), v. An obsolete form of spear.

spear-billed (spēr'bīld), a. Having a long, straight, and sharp bill, beak, or rostrum: as, the spear-billed grobes of the genus Aechmophorus. See ent under Aechmophorus. Cones.

spear-dog (spēr'dog), n. The common piked dog-fish, Squalus acanthias or Acanthias vulgaris. [Local, Eng.]

spearer (spēr'ēr), n. [< spear + -er.] 1. One who spears.—2. A person armed with a spear, whether for war or for ceremony.

spear-fish (spēr'fīsh), n. 1. A ctenostomoid fish of the genus Carpinodes, C. cyprinus, a kind of carp-sucker, also called sailfish, skimback, and quillback. It is common from the Mississippi valley to Chesapeake Bay.—2. The bill-fish, Tetrapturus albidus, belonging to the family Istiophoridae, or sailfishes. The dorsal fin is low or moderately developed, and the ventrals are represented only by spines. It inhabits American waters as far north as New England in summer, and is not seldom taken in the sword-fishery. In tropical seas its horizon is about 100 fathoms deep. The spear-fish is related to the sword-fish (though of another family), and has a similar beak or sword. It attains a length of six or eight feet. In the West Indies its Spanish name is aguja. Compare ent under sailfish.

spear-flower (spēr'flōr'ēr), n. A tree or shrub of the large tropical and subtropical genus Ardisia of the Myrsineae. The species are mostly handsome with white or red flowers and pea-form fruit, often blue. The name translates Ardisia, which alludes to the sharp segments of the calyx.

spear-foot (spēr'fūt), n. The off or right hind foot of a horse.

spear-grass (spēr'grās), n. 1. A name of various species of Agrostis, bent-grass, of Agropyrum repens, quitch-grass, of Alopecurus agrestis, foxtail, and perhaps of some other grasses. The spear-grass of Shakspeare, according to Eliaconbe, is the quitch-grass; according to Prior, it is the common reed, Phragmites communis. [Old or prov. Eng.]

To tickle our noses with spear-grass to make them bleed. Shak., I Hen. IV., II, 4, 340.

2. The June-grass, or Kentucky blue-grass, Poa pratensis (see cut under Poa); also other species of the genus. P. annua is the low or annual spear-grass. It is so called from the lance-shaped spikelets. (See meadow-grass.) The name is said to be applied also to the porcupine-grass, on account of its awns. [U. S.]

3. In New Zealand, a name of one or two plants of the umbelliferous genus Aciphylla: so called from their long grass-like leaflets, which have hard and sharp points.

spear-hand (spēr'hānd), n. The right hand or the right side, as distinguished from the shield-hand.

spear-head (spēr'hēd), n. The head of a spear. It is always pointed, and of iron or steel among people who know the use of iron, but anciently of bronze, and among some savage peoples of stone, bone, or the like. The form varies from that of a long double-edged blade which with its socket is two feet or more in length, as was common in throwing-spears of the Franks and Saxons, to the head of the fourteenth-century lance, which was a mere pointing of the wooden shaft with steel and only a few inches in length. The spear-head is often barbed, sometimes serrated or wavy, etc. Compare coronal, 2, also pilum, lance, javelin.

spear-hook (spēr'hūk), n. Same as spring-hook.

spear-javelin (spēr'jav'lin), n. Same as frama, 1.

spear-leaved lily. See lily, 1.

spear-lily (spēr'līl'i), n. A plant of one of three species of the Australian genus Doryanthes of the Amaryllidaceae. It has partly the habit of Agave, having a cluster of over one hundred sword-shaped leaves at the base, an erect stem, in D. excelsa from 10 to 18 feet high, with a dense terminal head of red flowers. The leaves of that species contain a fiber suitable for rope and paper-making.

spearman (spēr'mān), n. [pl. spear-men (men).] [< ME. sperman; < spear + man.] 1. One who uses or is armed with a spear; especially, a soldier whose spear is his principal weapon. Compare lancer, lanquenet, pikeman.

Why as an eel that slirs the mud Thick overhead, so baffling spearman's thrust. Browning, Ring and Book, II, 162.

2. A book-name for any leaf-beetle of the genus Doryphora. The Colorado potato-beetle, D. decemlineata, is the ten-lined spearman. See ent under beetle.

spearmint (spēr'mīnt), n. [Said to be a corruption of spire-mint, with ref. to the pyramidal inflorescence.] An Spear-mint (Athena viridis), upper part of the stem with the inflorescence. a, a flower.

aromatic plant, Mentha viridis, the common garden-mint, or mint proper. It is known chiefly in gardens, or as an escape from them, in both hemispheres, and is suspected to be a garden or accidental variety of M. sylvestris. Its properties are those of peppermint, and it yields an oil like that of the latter, but with a more pleasant flavor.—Spirit of spearmint. See spirit.

spear-nail (spēr'nāl), n. A form of nail with a spear-shaped point.

spear-plate (spēr'plāt), n. Same as strapping-plate.

spear-thistle (spēr'this'tl), n. See thistle.

spear-widgeon (spēr'wij'ōn), n. 1. The red-breasted merganser, Mergus serrator. Also called shelduck.—2. The goosander, Mergus merganser. [Irish in both uses.]

spearwood (spēr'wūd), n. One of two Australian trees, Eucalyptus Doratoyylon in the south-west, and Acacia Doratoyylon in the interior, or the wood of the same, sought by the natives for spear-shafts.

spearwort (spēr'wört), n. [ME. spereicorte, sperewort, AS. sperevort, spere, spear, + vort, wort: see spear<sup>1</sup> and wort<sup>1</sup>.] The name of several species of crowfoot or Ranunculus with lance-shaped leaves. R. lingua, the greater spearwort, is found in Europe and temperate Asia; R. Flammula, the lesser spearwort (also called banewort), through the north temperate zone; R. ophioglossifolius, the snake's-tongue or adder's-tongue spearwort, in southwestern Europe; R. ambigua (R. alismifolius), the water-plantain spearwort, in North America.

speat, n. Same as spate.

speave, v. t. A dialectal form of spay<sup>1</sup>.

speel (spek), n. A colloquial abbreviation of speculation.

They said what a very gen'roas thing it was o' them to have taken up the case on spee, and to charge nothing at all for costs unless they got 'em out of Mr. Pickwick.

Dickens, Pickwick, xxiv.

special (spesh'al), a. and n. [ME. special, speciall, speciale, spocyal, speeyalle, OF. special, especial, F. spécial = Fr. special, especial = Sp. especial = Pg. especial = It. speciale, special. L. specialis, belonging to a species, particular, < species, kind, species: see species. Doublet, especial.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to a species or sort; of a particular kind or character; distinct from other kinds; specifically characteristic.

Cristi kepe us out of harme and hate,
For this hooll spirit so special.

Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 67.

A special idea is coiled by the schools o' species.

Watts, Logic, I. iii. § 3.

A certain order of artistic culture should be adopted, answering to the order of development of the special sensibilities and faculties concerned.

J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 553.

2. Of or pertaining to one or more of a kind; peculiar to an individual or a set; not general; particular; individual.

He speaks thus in his special spell,
And of this matere mokes he mynde.

York Plays, p. 471.

For the question in hand, whether the commandments of God in Scripture be general or special, it skilleth not.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, III. 7.

The special charm of Oxford for Shelley lay in the comparative freedom of the student's life.

E. Dordan, Shelley, I. 56.

3. Peculiar or distinct of the kind; of exceptional character, amount, degree, or the like; especially distinguished; express; particular.

Thei suffer no Cristeno man entre in to that Place, but zif it be of speeyalle grace of the Soudan.

Manderille, Travels, p. 66.

Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer's cloud,
Without our special wonder?

Shak., Macbeth, III. 4. 112.

It is a fair and sensible paper, not of special originality or brilliancy.

O. W. Holmes, Emerson, I.

Other groups of phenomena require special study.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 382.

4. Specifically, limited as to function, operation, or purpose; designed for specific application or service; acting for a limited time or in a restricted manner; not general of the kind named: as, special legislation; special pleading; a special agent, constable, or correspondent; special employment; a special dictionary.

Too all his ost he gave a special charge,
Ayens that day that he shold fight alone.

Generides (E. E. T. S.), I. 3221.

To Eltham will I, whers the young king is,
Being ordoin'd his special governor.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI., I. 1. 171.

Estate tail special. See estate.—Heir special. See heir.—Special act. See statute.—Special administrator. An administrator appointed without full powers of administration, but for some special purpose, as to collect and hold assets and pay urgent debts pending a contest as to the probate of a will. Also called a temporary administrator, a collector, or an administrator ad colligendum.—Special agent. An agent authorized to transact in the service or interest of his principal only a particular transaction or a particular kind of business, as distinguished from a general agent: as, a special agent of the revenue department.—Special anatomy. See anatomy.—Special assignment. See partial assignment, under partial.—Special bail. See bail<sup>2</sup>, 3.—Special bailiff. bastard, case. See the nouns.—Special carrier. See carrier<sup>1</sup>, 2.—Special commission, in law, a commission of oyer and terminer issued by the crown to the judges for the trial of specific cases.—Special constable, contract, damages, demurrer, deposit, edict, homology, hospital, injunction, issue, jury, license, etc. See the nouns.—Special linear complex, the aggregate of all the lines of space that cut a given line.—Special logic, the rules for thinking concerning a certain kind of objects.

Such special logics only exhibit the mode in which a determinate matter or object of science, the knowledge of which is presupposed, must be treated, the conditions which regulate the certainty of inferences in that matter, and the methods by which our knowledge of it may be constructed into a scientific whole.

Sir W. Hamilton, Logic, III.

Special orders, paper, partner, plea, pleader, pleading, property, providence, retainer, sessions, statute, tail, verdict, etc. See the nouns.—Special trust, an active trust; a trust which involves specific duties on the part of the trustee, as distinguished from a general or naked trust, in which he holds only a legal title and it may be possession, but the entire right of disposal is in the beneficiary.—Syn. Special, Especial, Particular, Peculiar, Specific. Special is more common than especial, which has the same meaning; but especially is for rhetorical reasons (because it occurs most frequently at the beginning of a dependent clause, where usually an unaccented particle occurs, and where, therefore, a word with an accent on the first syllable is instinctively avoided) much more common than speciality. The special comes under the general, as the particular comes under the special. A special favor is one that is more than ordinary; a particular favor is still more remarkable; a peculiar favor comes very closely home. When we speak of any particular thing, we distinguish it from all others; when we speak of a specific fault in one's character, we name it with exactness; a special law is one that is made for a particular purpose or a peculiar case; a specific law is either one that we name exactly or one that names offenses, etc., exactly.

II. n. 1. A special or particular person or thing. Specifically—(a) A particular thing; a particular.

Thir's all the specials I of speake.

Raid of the Redcrosse (Child's Ballads, VI. 138).

(b) A private companion; a paramour or concubine.

Special, concubine, the woman (special or leman).
Concubina. Prompt. Parv., p. 403.

Syr Roger of Donkester,

That was her owne special.

Lytle Geste of Robyn Hood (Child's Ballads, V. 123).

2. A person or thing appointed or set apart for a special purpose or occasion, as a constable, a railway-train, an examination, a dispatch, etc.: as, they traveled by special to Chicago; the specials were called out to quell the riot.

What are known as specials are being held this week. These are for men who partially failed at the last regular examinations.

In special, in a special manner; especially; particularly. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Se thou throw in special

Chaucer, Troilus, I. 901.

But yf vertue and nurture were wille alle;

To yow therefore I speke in specialle.

specialisation, specialise. See specialization, specialize.

specialism (spesh'al-izm), n. [< special + -ism.] Devotion to a special branch or division of a general subject or pursuit; the characteristic pursuit or theme of a specialist; restriction to a speciality. [Recent.]

Special hospitals and specialism in medical practice are in danger of being carried too far. Lancet, 1889, II. 1049.

All specialism of study, one-sidedness of view, and division of labor is dangerous [according to Comte].

N. A. Rev., CXX. 259.

specialist (spesh'al-ist), n. [< special + -ist.] A person who devotes himself to a particular branch of a profession, science, or art; one who has a special knowledge of some particular subject: thus, ophthalmologists, neurologists, or gynecologists are specialists in medicine.

Specialists are the corn-insects that build up a reef.

O. W. Holmes, Poet at the Breakfast-table, III.

specialistic (spesh'al-ist'ik), a. [< specialist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a specialist or specialism. [Recent.]

The learned specialistic mind takes in the facts of one or two creeds or departments. Athenæum, No. 3273, p. 87.

specialità (> D. specialiteit = G. specialität = Sw. Dan. specialitet), < L. specialitas (-t-), particularity, peculiarity, < specialis, particular, special: see special. Cf. speciality, a doublet of speciality, as personality, reality, etc., are of personality, reality, etc.] 1. A special characteristic or attribute; a distinctive feature, property, or quality; a condition or circumstance especially distinguishing a class or an individual. [In this abstract sense speciality is preferable to the form specialty, on the analogy of personality, reality, and other words of similar tenor as related to personally, really, etc. The distinction, so far as it exists, is accidental; the syncope form, in these pairs, is more vernacular, the full form more recent and official.]

It is the speciality of all vice to be selfishly indifferent to the injurious consequences of our actions, even . . . to those nearest to us. F. P. Cobbe, Peak in Darien, p. 32.

The specialities of nature, chiefly mental, which we see produced, . . . must be ascribed almost wholly to direct equilibration. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 170.

2. A special matter or thing; a characteristic or distinctive object, pursuit, diversion, operation, product, or the like; a speciality. See speciality, 6.

The speciality of the sport was to see how some for his slackness had a good bob with the bag.

Lancham, quoted in Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, p. 101.

The small State of Rhode Island, whose speciality has always been the manufacture of ordnance.

Comte de Paris, Civil War in America (trans.), I. 187.

specialization (spesh'al-i-zā'shōn), n. [< specialize + -ation.] 1. The act or process of specializing; a making or fixing of special differences or requirements; differentiation.

In the history of Law the most important early specialization is that which separates what a man ought to do from what he ought to know.

Mathe, Early Law and Custom, p. 13.

2. The state of being or becoming specialized; a condition of fixed or developed differentiation, as of parts, organs, or individuals, with reference to form, appearance, function, etc.

That there is [in women] . . . a mental specialization joined with this bodily specialization is undeniable; and this mental specialization, though primarily related to this rearing of offspring, affects in some degree the conduct at large.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 375.

3. In biol., that evolutionary process whereby parts or organs primitively indifferent or of common character become differentiated in form or function (usually in both); also, the result of such process or course of development; adaptive modification. The most exact synonym is differentiation (which see). It is common to say differentiation of structure, but specialization of function, giving to the former word a morphological and to the latter a physiological significance. Since, however, change of form almost always implies change in use of the parts thus modified in adaptation to different purposes, the two words come to the same thing in the end, and may be interchangeable. The whole course of biological evolution is from the most general to some particular form and function, or from that which is simple, primitive, indifferent, and low in the scale of organization to that which is a complex of particulars and thus highly organized. Such specialization is expressed both in the structure of any of the higher animals and plants, regarded as wholes to be compared with other wholes, and in the structure of their several parts, organs, or tissues, compared with one another in the same animal or plant, and compared with the corresponding parts, organs, or tissues in different animals and plants. The actual ways in which or means by which specialization is known or supposed to be effected are among the broadest problems in biology. See biological matter under evolution, Darwinism, selection, survival, variation, species, protoplasm, morphology, homology, analogy, heredity, environment, and words of like bearing on the points in question.

All physiologists admit that the specialization of organs, inasmuch as they perform in this state their functions better, is an advantage to each being.

Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 122.

This [frizzly] character of hair must be a specialization, for it seems very unlikely that it was the attribute of the common ancestors of the human races.

W. H. Flower, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 320.

Also spelled specialisation.

specialize (spesh'al-iz), v.; pret. and pp. specialized, ppr. specializing. [= F. spécialiser; as special + -ize.] I. trans. 1. To make individually or generically special or distinct; make specifically distinct; differentiate from other kinds in form, adaptation, or characteristics, as by a process of physical development; limit to a particular kind of development, action, or use. See specialization, 3.

The sensitiveness of the filaments [of Dionæa Muscipula] is of a specialized nature, being related to a momentary touch rather than to prolonged pressure.

The eye is a highly specialized organ, admirably adapted for the important function which it fulfills.

Stokes, Light, p. 60.

Prudence may be said to be merely Wisdom specialized by the definite acceptance of Self-interest as its sole ultimate end.

H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 304.

24. To mention specially or in detail; particularize; specify.

Our Saviour specializing and nominating the places.
Sheldon, Miracles (1616), p. 261.

II. intraus. To act in some special way; pursue a special course or direction; take a specific turn or bent.

That some cells have specialized on the amoeboid character is seen in the so-called myeloplaxas.
Lancet, 1889, II, 635.

Also spelled specialise.

specializer (spesh'ul-i-zér), n. One who makes a specialty of anything; a specialist. Also spelled specialiser. The Nation.

specialty (spesh'ul-i-ti), adv. [cf. ME. specialty, specialtyche; cf. special + -ly. Doublet of speciality.] 1. In a special manner; specifically; particularly; exceptionally; especially.

Thy sould be elene of every wyce,
And specialite, of Countreye.

Lander, Dewloft of Kyngis (E. E. T. S.), I, 461.

The earth . . . of Scripture generally is specialty the dry land.
Dawson, Nature and the Bible, p. 101.

2. For a particular reason or purpose; by special or exceptional action or proceeding; as, a meeting specialty called; an officer specialty designated.

The Latin tongue lived on in Britain after the withdrawal of the legions, but it lived on, as it lives on in modern countries, as a book-language specialty learned.
L. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 121.

specialty (spesh'ul-i-ti), u.; pl. specialties (-tiz). [cf. ME. specialte, specialte, specialte, specialte, specialte, etc., a more vernacular form of specialite, specialite, etc., a specialty; see speciality.] 1. The fact or condition of being special or particular; particularly of origin, cause, use, significance, etc. [Rare.]

And that they that be ordeyned to sette metys bringe them be orde and continually t) alle be served, and not ordinarily. And thorow affeccion to persons or by specialte.
Diaries of a King (E. E. T. S.), p. 259.

It is no denial of the specialty of vital or psychical phenomena to reduce them to the same elementary motions as those manifested in cosmic phenomena.
G. H. Lewer, Probs. of Life and Mind, II, vi, § 25.

2. The special or distinctive nature of anything; essence; principle; groundwork. [Rare.]

The specialty of rule hath been neglected.
Shak., I, and C, I, 3, 75.

3. A special quality or characteristic; a distinguishing feature; a specialty. See speciality, 1.

The last Supper at San Marco is an excellent example of the natural reverence of an artist of that time, with whom reverence was not, as one may say, a specialty.
H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 218.

4. A special or particular matter or thing; something specific or exceptional in character, relation, use, or the like.

Acosta nametheth diverse strange specialties, excepted from the general Rules of Nature's wanted course.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 572.

5. A special employment or pursuit; a distinct occupation or division of duty or interest; that which one does especially, either by choice or by assignment.

As each individual selects a special mode of activity for himself, and aims at improvement in that specialty, he finds himself attaining a higher and still higher degree of aptitude for it.
Dr. Carpenter, Correlation and Conserv. of Forces, p. 410.

6. A special product or manufacture; something made in a special manner or form, or especially characteristic of the producer or of the place of production; as, a dealer in specialties; also, an article to which a dealer professes to pay special attention or care, or which is alleged to possess special advantages in regard to quality, quantity, or price; as, fountain-pens a specialty. See the second quotation under speciality, 2.—7. In law, an instrument under seal, containing an express or implied agreement for the payment of money. The word has also been loosely used to include obligations or debts upon recognition, judgments and decrees, and statutes, because these, being matter of record, rank in solemnity, conclusiveness, and endurance with free contracts under seal.

Let specialties be therefore drawn between us.
Shak., T, of the S, II, t. 127.

All instruments under seal, of record, and liabilities imposed by statute, are specialties within the meaning of the Stat. 21 James I. Wood, On Limitation of Actions, § 23.

specie (spé'siô or -shiô), n. [L. specie, pl. of species, kind, formerly much used in the phrase in specie, in kind, in ML. in coin; see species.] 1. As a Latin noun, used in the phrase in specie: (a) In kind.

So a lion is a perfect creature in himself, though it be less than that of a buffalo, or a rhinoceros. They differ but in specie; either in the kind is absolute; both have their parts, and either the whole. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

You must pay him in specie, Madam; give him love for his wit.
Dryden, Mock Astrologer, v. 1.

Uneconomical application of punishment, though proper, perhaps, as well in specie as in decree.
Beaumont, Infrad. to Morals and Legislation, xvi, 54, nolo.

(b) In coin. See def. 2. Hence, as an English noun—2. Coin; metallic money; a medium of exchange consisting of gold or silver (the precious metals) coined by sovereign authority in pieces of various standard weights and values, and of minor coins of copper, bronze, or some other cheap or base metal: often used attributively. The earliest coinage of specie is attributed to the Lydians, about the eighth century B. C. Previously, and long afterward in many countries, pieces of silver and gold (the latter only to a small extent) were passed by weight in payments, as lumps of silver are still in China. The use of specie as a measure of price is based upon the intrinsic value of the precious metals as commodities, which has diminished immensely since ancient times, but is comparatively stable for long periods under normal circumstances. In modern civilized communities specie or bullion is largely used by banks as a basis or security for circulating notes (bank-notes) representing it. In times of great financial disturbance this security sometimes becomes inadequate from depletion or through excessive issues of notes, and a general suspension of specie payments takes place, followed by great depreciation of the paper money. General suspensions of specie payments occurred in the United States in 1837, 1857, and 1861, the last, due to the civil war, continuing till 1870. Specie payments by British banks were suspended by law, in consequence of the French wars, from 1797 to 1825, but were actually resumed by the Bank of England in 1825. Similar interruptions of solvency have occurred in the other European countries, resulting in some in the substitution of depreciated paper money for specie in ordinary use and reckoning.—Specie circular, in U. S. hist., a circular issued by the Secretary of the Treasury in July, 1836, by direction of President Jackson, ordering United States agents to receive in future only gold and silver or Treasury certificates in payment for government lands.

species (spé'shiôz), u.; pl. species. [In ME. specie, specie, species, kind, specie (see specie); in moil. E. directly from the L.; = sp. specie, species (specie, coin), = Sp. sp. specie = li. specie = *G. Hence special, special, specie, specie, specie, specie, specie, etc. From the same li. verb are li. spectacle, aspect, expect, inspect, prospect, respect, suspect, etc., respite, dispute, suspicion, etc., and the second element in inspire, franchise, specie, etc.] 1. An appearance or representation to the senses or the perceptive faculties; an image presented to the eye or the mind. According to the Roman Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation, the species, the outward and visible forms or the appearance of bread and wine in the eucharist, are the accidents only of bread and wine severally, the substance no longer existing after consecration. See intentional species, below.

The sun, the great eye of the world, prying into the recesses of rocks and the hollows of valleys, receives species or visible forms from these objects.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1833), I, 7-2.

With . . . is no other than the faculty of imagination in the writer, which reaches over all the memory for the species or ideas of those things which it designs to represent.
Dryden.

By putting such a rubric into its Missal, the church of Milan sought to express nothing more than that the accidents or species of the sacrament are broken.
Lock, Church of our Fathers, I, 123.

2]. Something to be seen or looked at; a spectacle or exhibition; a show.

Shows and species serve best with the people. Bacon.

3. [Tr. of Gr. eidô.] In logic, and hence in ordinary language, a class included under a higher class, or, at least, not considered as including lower classes; a kind; a sort; a number of individuals having common characters peculiar to them.

There is a private specie of pride that waiteth first to be saluted or he wot saluted. Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

Different essences alone . . . make different species.
Locke, Human Understanding, III, vi, 23.

It is well for thee that . . . we came under a convention to pardon every species of liberty which we may take with each other. Scott, Redgauntlet, letter III.

A poor preacher held the worst possible species of a poor man.
W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 222.

4. One of the kinds of things constituting a combined aggregate or a compound; a distinct constituent part or element; an instrumental means; as, the species of a compound medicine. [Now rare in this medical sense, and obsolete or archaic in others.]

In Algebra, Species are those Letters, Characters, Notes, or Marks which represent the Quantities in any Equation or Demonstration.
E. Phillips, New World of Words (ed. 1706).

5. In biol., that which is specialized or differentiated recognizably from anything else of the same genus, family, or order; an individual which differs, or collectively those individuals which differ, specifically from all the other members of the genus, etc., and which do not differ from one another in size, shape, color, and so on, beyond the limits of (actual or assumed) individual variability, as those animals and plants which stand in the direct relation of parent and offspring, and perpetuate certain inherited characters intact or with that little modification which is due to conditions of environment. Species is thus practically, and for purposes of classification, the middle term between genus on the one hand and individual (or specimen) on the other; and only the latter can be said in strictness to have material existence, so that species, like genus, etc., is in this sense an abstract conception. It is also an assured fact in biology that no given stock or lineage breeds perfectly true in all its individuals; the line of descent is always marked by modification of characters (due to the interaction between heredity and environment); the whole tendency of such modification is toward further specialization, in the preservation of the more useful and the extinction of the less useful or the useless characters, and thus to the gradual acquirement, by insensible increments, of differences impressed upon a plastic organism from without—which is as much as to say that new species have always been in process of evolution, and still continue to be so developed. (See biological senses of evolution, selection, survival, and variation.) Such evolution has in fact been arrested at some point for every species once existent whose members have perished in time past; and of those specific forms whose adaptation to their environment has fitted them to survive till the present some are tending to perpetuation and some to extinction, but all are subject to incessant modification, for better or worse. (See adaptation, reversion, 2, retrograde, a, 3, degradation, 7, 8, and paranthesis, 2.) Such are the views taken by nearly all biologists of the present day, in direct opposition to the former opinion of a special creation, which proceeded upon the assumption that all species of animals and plants, such as we find them actually to be, came into existence by creative fiat at some one time, and have since been perpetuated with little if any modification. In consequence of the fact that the greatest as well as the least differences in organisms are of degree and not of kind, no rigorous and unexceptionable distinction of species is possible in either the animal or the vegetable kingdom; and in the actual naming, characterizing, and classifying of species, naturalists differ widely, some reducing to one or two species the same series of individuals which others describe as a dozen or twenty species. (See Linnaeus, 3, filter, 2.) This, however, is rather a nomenclature than a doctrinal difference. The difficulty of deciding in many cases, and the impossibility of deciding in some, what degree of difference between given specimens shall be considered specific, and so formally named in the binomial system, have led to the introduction of several terms above and below the species (see subgenus, subspecies, conspicies, varieties, race, 5, a), intergrade, r. f), and also to a modification of the binomial nomenclature (see polynomial, 2, and trivial). Two tests are commonly applied to the discrimination between good species and mere subspecies or varieties: (1) the individuals of thoroughly distinct species do not interbreed, or, if they are near enough to hybridize, their progeny is usually infertile, so that the cross is not in perpetuity; the horse and ass offer a good case in point; (2) the specific distinctions do not vanish by insensible degrees when large series of specimens from different geographical localities or geological horizons are available for comparison; for, should characters assumed to be distinctive, and therefore specific, be found to grade away under such scrutiny, they are by that fact proved to be non-specific, and the specimens in question are reducible to the rank of conspecies, subspecies, varieties, or races. Attempts which have been made to a partemankind into several species of the genus Homo fail according to both of the criteria above stated. To these may be added, in judging the validity of an alleged species, the third premise, that stable specific forms are evolved by or in the course of natural selection only; for all the countless stocks or breeds resulting from artificial selection, however methodically conducted, tend to revert when left to themselves, and also hybridize freely; they are not therefore in perpetuity except under cultivation, and are no species in a proper sense, though their actual differences may have become, under careful selection, far greater than those usually accounted specific or even generic. (See dog, rose.) Taking into account geological succession in time as well as geographical distribution in space, and proceeding upon accepted doctrines of the evolution of all forms of animal and vegetable life from antecedent forms, it is evident, first, that "species" is predicable only by means of the "missing links" in the chain of genetic relationships; for, were all organisms that have ever existed before our eyes in their actual evolutionary sequences, we should find no gap or break in the whole series; but, secondly, that development along unnumbered diverging lines of descent with modification has in fact resulted (through obliteration of the consecutive steps in the process) in the living fauna and flora of the globe, in respect of which not only specific, but generic, ordinal, and still broader distinctions are easily and certainly predicable. It does not appear that any animal or plant has always maintained what we now find its specific character to be; yet the persistence of some forms under no greater variation than that usually accounted generic is established, as in the case of the genus Lingula, whose members have survived from the Silurian to the present epoch with only specific modification. In the animal kingdom probably about 250,000 species have been described, recorded, and formally named by a word following the name of the genus to which they are severally ascribed (see under specific); the actual number of species is doubtless much greater than this; some 200,000 species are insects (see Insecta), of which 80,000 or more belong to one order (see Coleoptera). These estimates are exclusive of merely nominal species. (See synonym.) The known species of flowering plants are summed up by Darand in his "Index Generum Phanerogamorum" as follows: dicotyledons, 78,200; monocotyledons, 19,600; gymnosperms, 2,420—10 all, 100,220. This is the net result after extensive sifting. To this number large additions are to be expected from regions, as central Africa, still imperfectly or not at all explored. Of the number of cryptogams no reliable estimate can at present be given. The described species of fungi, judging from the eight volumes of Saccardo's work now published, are likely to number, before sifting, about 50,000. Abbreviated sp., with plural  spp.

6†. Coin; metallic money; specie. See specie.

Rome possessed a much greater proportion of the circulating species of its time than any European city.

Arbutus, Ancient Coins.

Species, your honour knows, is of easier conveyance. Garrick, Neck or Nothing, II. 2.

He [Necker] affirms that, from the year 1720 to the year 1784, there was coined at the mint of France, in the species of gold and silver, to the amount of about one hundred millions of pounds sterling. Burke, Rev. in France.

7. One of a class of pharmaceutical preparations consisting of a mixture of dried herbs of analogous medicinal properties, used for making decoctions, infusions, etc. See under tea.

—8. In civil law, the form or shape given to materials; fashion; form; figure. Burrill.

9. In math.: (a) A letter in algebra denoting a quantity. [This meaning was borrowed by some early writers from the French of Vête, who derived it from a Latin translation of Diophantus, who uses ε to mean a term of a polynomial in a particular power of the unknown quantity.] (b) A fundamental operation of arithmetic. See the four species, below.

Disjunct species, in logic. See disjunct.—Intelligible species. See intentional species.—Intentional species, a similitude or simulacrum of an outward thing; the vicarious object in perception and thought, according to the doctrine held and attributed to Aristotle by the medieval realists, beginning with Aquinas. Such species were divided into sensible species and intelligible species, which distinction and terminology, originating with Aquinas, were accepted by Scotus and others. The sensible species mediated between the outward object and the senses. They were metaphorically called emanations, but, being devoid of matter, are not to be confounded with the emanations of Democritus, from which they also differ in being related to other senses besides sight. So far as they belong to the outward thing they were called impressed, so far as they are perceived by the mind expressed species.

From these sensible species the agent intellect, by an act of abstraction, was supposed to separate certain intelligible species, which the higher or patent intellect was able to perceive. These intelligible species so far as they belong to sense were called impressed, so far as they are perceived by the intellect expressed species. Species were further distinguished as acquired, infused, and connatural. The doctrine of intentional species was rejected by the nominalists, and exploded early in the seventeenth century, but not until the nineteenth was it generally acknowledged to be foreign to the opinion of Aristotle.

—Nascent species, in bot., a species of animal or plant in the act, as it were, of being born or produced; an incipient species, whose characters are not yet established in the course of its development.—Sensible species. See intentional species.—Species anthelminticæ, a mixture of equal parts of abanthium, tansy, camomile, and santonica.—Species diureticæ, a mixture of equal parts of roots of lovage, asparagus, fennel, parsley, and butcher's-broom.—Species laxantes. Same as St. Germain tea (which see, under tea).—Species pectorales. Same as breast tea (which see, under tea).—Species sudorificæ. Same as wood tea (which see, under tea).

—Subaltern species, in logic, that which is both a species of some higher genus and a genus in respect of the species into which it is divided.—The four species, the four fundamental operations of arithmetic—addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division. This phrase, rare in English but common in German, seems to have been first so applied by the East Frisian mathematician Gemma in 1510. It was borrowed from logic, where since Petrus Hispanus four species of logical procedure are enumerated in all the old books. Thus, Wilson (1551) says: "There be four kinds of argumentes, a perfecte argument, an imperfecte argument, an inductione, an example"; and Blundeville (1593): "There be foure principall kinds or formes of argumentation, that is, a syllogisme, an induction, an enthymeme, and example."

species-cover (sp' shēz-kuv'ēr), n. The cover used in a herbarium to inclose and protect all the species-sheets of a single species. Such covers are usually made of folded sheets of light-weight brown paper, a little larger than the species-sheets.

species-cycle (sp' shēz-sī'kl), n. In bot., the complete series of forms needed to represent adequately the entire life-history of a species.

species-monger (sp' shēz-mung'gēr), n. In nat. hist.: (a) One who occupies himself mainly or exclusively in naming and describing species, without inclination to study, or perhaps without ability to grasp, their significance as biological facts; a specialist in species, who cares little or nothing for broader generalizations. (b) One who is finical in drawing up specific diagnoses, or given to distinctions without a difference. [Cant in both senses.]

species-paper (sp' shēz-pā'pēr), n. Same as species-sheet.

species-sheet (sp' shēz-shēt), n. One of the sheets or pieces of paper upon which the individual specimens of a species in a herbarium are mounted for preservation and display. They are usually made of heavy stiff white paper, the standard size of which is, in the United States, 16½ x 11½ inches, weighing about 28 pounds to the ream. Only a single species is placed on a sheet, and its label is placed in the lower right-hand corner.

specificable (spes'i-fi-ā-bl), a. [specific + -able.] That may be specified; capable of being distinctly named or stated.

A minute but specificable fraction of an original disturbance may be said to get through any obstacle.

Nature, XXXVIII. 602.

specific (sp' sif'ik), a. and n. [OF. spécifique, F. spécifique = Sp. específico = Pg. específico = It. specifico (cf. G. spezifisch), < ML. specifiens, specific, particular, < L. species, kind, + -ficus, < facere, make.] I. a. 1. That is specified or defined; distinctly named, formulated, or determined; of a special kind or a definite tenor; determinate; explicit; as, a specific sum of money; a specific offer; specific obligations or duties; a specific aim or pursuit.

To be actuated by a desire for pleasure is to be actuated by a desire for some specific pleasure to be enjoyed by oneself.

T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 282.

In addition to these broad differences, there are finer differences of specific quality within each sense.

J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 115.

2. Pertaining to or accordant with what is specified or determined; relating to or regarding a definite subject; conformable to special occasion or requirement, prescribed forms, or known conditions; having a special use or application.

It was in every way stimulating and suggestive to have detected a specific bond of relationship in speech and in culture between such different peoples as the English and the Hindus.

J. Fiske, Evolutionist, p. 109.

3. Of or pertaining to a species. (a) Pertaining to a logical species. (b) In zool. and bot., of or pertaining to species or a species; constituting a species; peculiar to, characteristic of, or diagnostic of a species; designating or denominating a species; not generic or of wider application than to a species; as, specific characters; specific difference; a specific name. See generic, subgeneric, conspecific, subspecific.

4. Peculiar; special.

Their style, like the style of Bionardo in poetry, of Botticelli in painting, is specific to Italy in the middle of the fifteenth century. J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 251.

5. In law, having a certain or well-defined form or designation; observing a certain form; precise.—6. In med., related to special infection, particularly syphilitic infection; produced by some distinct zymotic poison.—Specific cause, in med., a cause which in operation will produce some special disease.—Specific centers, points or periods in the course of evolution at which an organism is supposed to become specifically differentiated from a common stock, having assumed or acquired its specific characters.—Specific characters, in zool. and bot., the diagnostic marks of a species; differences of whatever kind, which are peculiar to a species and serve to distinguish it from any other. The sum of such characters, or the total specific characteristics, are also spoken of as the specific character. Any one such mark or feature is a specific character.—Specific denial, in law, denial which itself recites what is denied, or which sufficiently specifies what particular part of the adversary's allegations is denied, as distinguished from a general denial of all his allegations.—Specific difference, in logic. See difference.—Specific disease, a disease produced by a special infection, as syphilis.—Specific duty, in a tariff, an impost of specified amount upon any object of a particular kind, or upon a specified quantity of a commodity, entered at a custom-house.—Specific gravity. See gravity.—Specific heat. See heat.—Specific inductive capacity. See capacity and induction, 6.—Specific intent, legacy, men. See the nouns.—Specific medicine or remedy, a medicine or remedy that has a distinct effect in the cure of a certain disease, as mercury in syphilis, or quinine in intermittent fever.—Specific name, in zool. and bot., the second term in the binomial name of an animal or a plant, which designates or specifies a member of a genus, and which is joined to the generic name to complete the scientific or technical designation. Thus, in the name Felis leo, leo is the specific name, designating the lion as a member of the genus Felis, and as specifically different from Felis tigris, the tiger, Felis catina, the wildcat, etc. Also called nomen specificum, and formerly nomen trinitate or tributivum. See binomial, 2, and nomen.—Specific performance, relief, resistance. See the nouns.—Specific rotatory power. See rotatory, = Syn. 1 and 2. Particular, etc. See specific.

II. n. Something adapted or expected to produce a specific effect; that which is, or is supposed to be, capable of infallibly bringing about a desired result; especially, a remedy which cures, or tends to cure, a certain disease, whatever may be its manifestations, as mercury used as a remedy for syphilis.

Always you find among people, in proportion as they are ignorant, a belief in specifics, and a great confidence in pressing the adoption of them.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 20.

specific (sp' sif'ik-ā), a. [< specific + -al.] Same as specific. [Archaic.]

To compel the performance of the contract, and recover the specific sum due. Blackstone, Comm., III. ix.

specifically (sp' sif'ik-ā-lī), adv. 1. In a specific manner; according to the nature of the species or of the case; definitely; particularly; explicitly; in a particular sense, or with a particularly differentiated application.

But it is rather manifest that the essence of spirits is a substance specifically distinct from all corporeal matter whatsoever. Dr. H. More, Antidote against Atheism, iii. 12.

Those several virtues that are specifically requisite to a due performance of this duty. South, Sermons.

2. With reference to a species, or to specific difference; as a species.

specificallyness (sp' sif'ik-ā-nes), n. The state of being specific. [Rare.]

specificate (sp' sif'ik-ā-tē), v. t. [< ML. specificatus, pp. of specificare, specify: see specify.] To denote or distinguish specifically; specify.

Now life is the character by which Christ specifies and denominates himself. Donne, Sermons, vii.

specification (spes'i-fi-kā'shən), n. [= F. spécification = Sp. especificación = Pg. especificação = It. specificazione, < ML. specificatio(n)], a specifying, enumeration, < specificare, specify: see specify.] 1. An act of specifying, or making a detailed statement, or the statement so made; a definite or formal mention of particulars; as, a specification of one's requirements.

All who had relatives or friends in this predicament were required to furnish a specification of them.

Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., I. 7.

2. An article, item, or particular specified; a special point, detail, or reckoning upon which a claim, an accusation, an estimate, a plan, or an assertion is based: as, the specifications of an architect or an engineer, of an indictment, etc.; the specification of the third charge against a prisoner; statements unsupported by specifications.—3. The act of making specific, or the state of having a specific character; reference to or correlation with a species or kind; determination of species or specific relation.

For, were this the method, miracles would no more be miracles than the diurnal revolution of the sun, the growth and specification of plants and animals, the attraction of the magnet, and the like.

Evelyn, True Religion, II. 105.

Here we may refer to two principles which Kant put forward under the names of Homogeneity and Specification.

F. H. Bradley, Ethical Studies, p. 68.

4. In patent law, the applicant's description of the manner of constructing and using his invention. It is required to be so explicit as to enable any person skilled in the art or science to make and use the same; and in the United States it forms part of the patent, which cannot therefore protect the inventor in anything not within the specification.

5. In civil law, the formation of a new property from materials belonging to another person. Specification exists where a person works up materials belonging to another into something which must be taken to be a new substance—for example, where whisky is made from corn. The effect is that the owner of the materials loses his property in them, and has only an action for the value of them against the person by whom they have been used. The doctrine originates in the civil law, but has been adopted by the common law, under the name of confusion and accession, at least where the person making the specification acts in good faith.—Accusative of specification. Same as synecdochical accusative. See synecdochical.—Charges and specifications. See charge.—Law of specification. In Kantian philos., the logical principle that, however far the process of logical determination may be carried, it can always be carried further.—Principle of specification, in Kantian philos.: (a) The logical maxim that we should be careful to introduce into a hypothesis all the elements which the facts to be explained call for, or that cuius variatæ non temere esse minuentur, which is a counteracting maxim to Occam's razor. (b) Same as law of specification.

specificity (spes'i-fis'i-ti), n. [< specific + -ity.] The state of being specific, or of having a specific character or relation; specific affinity, cause, origin, or effect; specificness. [Recent.]

The suddenness, vigor, and specificity of their effects.

F. W. H. Myers, Proc. Lond. Soc. Psychic Research.

Are we any longer to allow to this disease [cowpox] any high degree of specificity? Lancet, 1889, I. 1130.

specificize (sp' sif'is-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. specificized, ppr. specificizing. [< specific + -ize.] To make specific; give a special or specific character to. [Recent.]

The richest specificized apparatus of nervous mechanism. Allen and Neurol., VI. 483.

specificness (sp' sif'ik-nes), n. The state or character of being specific.

specify (spes'i-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. specified, pp. specifying. [< ME. specifyen, specifien, < OF. specifier, specifier, F. spécifier = Pr. Sp. P. g. especificar = It. specificare = D. specificeren = G. spezifieren = Sw. specificera = Dan. specificere, < ML. specificare, make specific, mention specifically, < specifians, specific, particular: see specific.] 1. To mention specifically or explicitly; state exactly or in detail; name distinctly: as, to specify the persons concerned in a given act; to specify one's wants, or articles required.

Ther cowde no man the nowmber specifice.
Generydes (L. E. T. S.), l. 1053.
I nevere haddo to do more with the seyd John Wortes than is specified in the seyd instruction.

There is no need of specifying particulars in this class of uses.
Emerson, Nature, p. 17.

2. To name as a requisite, as in technical specifications; set down in a specification.—3. To make specific; give a specific character to; distinguish as of a species or kind. [Rare.]

Be specified in yourself, but not specified by anything foreign to yourself. P. H. Bradley, Mental Studies, p. 71.

Spec. To indicate, particularize, individualize.
specillum (spē-sil'um), n.; pl. specilla (-i). [L., < specere, look, behold: see species.] 1. In med., a probe.—2. A lens; an eye-glass.

specimen (spes'i-men), n. [= F. spécimen = Sp. espécimen, < L. specimin, that by which a thing is known, a mark, token, proof, < sperere, see: see species.] 1. A part or an individual taken as exemplifying a whole mass or number; something that represents or illustrates all of its kind; an illustrative example: as, a collection of geological specimens; a wild specimen of the human or of the feline race; a specimen page of a book (a page shown as a specimen of what the whole is or is to be); a specimen copy of a medal.

The best specimens of the Attic coinage give a weight of 4.366 grammes (Gr. 284 grains Troy) for the drachma.
Trans. Amer. Philol. Ass., XVI, 117.

Curzola is a perfect specimen of a Venetian town.
B. J. Freeman, Venice, p. 205.

The last sculpture in the door jamb of the Cathedral of Florence affords specimens of the best Italian work of this sort (fourteenth century).

C. H. Moore, Gothic Architecture, p. 200.
2. In zool. and bot., an individual animal or plant, or some part of one, prepared and preserved for scientific examination; an example of a species or other group; a preparation: as, a specimen of natural history; a specimen of the dog or the rose. Abbreviated sp. and spec.—3. A typical individual; one serving as a specially striking or exaggerated example of the kind indicated. [Jocose and colloq.]

There were some curious specimens among my visitors.
Thoreau, Walden, p. 107.

Specimen, Sample. A specimen is a part of a larger whole employed to exhibit the nature or kind of that of which it forms a part, without reference to the relative quality of individual portions; thus, a cabinet of mineralogical specimens exhibits the nature of the rocks from which they are broken. A sample is a part taken out of a quantity, and implies that the quality of the whole is to be judged by it, and not rarely that it is to be used as a standard for testing the goodness, genuineness, or purity of the whole, and the like. In many cases, however, the words are used indifferently. Sample is more often used in trade: as, a sample of cotton or coffee.

speciolog-ical (spē-shi-ō-lōj'i-kul), a. [< speciolog-y + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to speciology.

speciology (spē-shi-ō-lōj'i), n. [< L. species, species, < Gr. ζῷον, < ζῆν, speak: see -ology.] In bot., the science of species; the doctrine of the origin and nature of species.

speciosity (spē-shi-ōs'i-ti), n.; pl. speciosities (-tiz). [< OF. speciosité = Sp. especiosidad = Pg. especiosidade = It. speciosità, < LL. speciositas, good looks, beauty, < L. speciosus, good-looking, beautiful, splendid: see specious.] 1. The state of being specious or beautiful; a beautiful show or spectacle; something delightful to the eye.

So great a glory as all the speciosities of the world could not equalise.

Dr. H. More, On Godliness, III. vi. § 5. (Dyce, Dict.)
2. The state of being specious or plausible; a specious show; a specious person or thing. [Rare.]

Professors built so largely on speciosity instead of performance.

specious (spē-shus), a. [< ME. specious, < OF. speciosus, F. spécieux = Sp. P. g. especioso = It. specioso, < L. speciosus, good-looking, beautiful, fair, < species, form, figure, beauty: see species.] 1. Pleasing to the eye; externally fair or showy; appearing beautiful or charming; slightly; beautiful. [Archaic.]

The rest, far greater part,
Will deem in outward rites and specious forms Religion satisfied. Milton, P. L., xli. 534.

2. Superficially fair, just, or correct; appearing well; apparently right; plausible; beguiling: as, specious reasoning; a specious argument; a specious person or book.

It is easy for princes under various specious pretences to defend, disguise, and conceal their ambitious desires.
Macaulay, Political Fables, II., Expl.

Thou specious friend without a brain. Prior, A Fable.

A brief yet specious tale, how I had wasted
The sun in secret riot. Shelley, The Cenci, III. 1.

3. Appearing actual, or in reality; actually existing; not imaginary. [Rare.]

Let me sum up, now, by saying that we are constantly conscious of a certain duration—the specious present—varying in length from a few seconds to probably not more than a minute, and that this duration (with its content perceived as having one part earlier and the other part later) is the original intuition of time.

W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 642.

4. Pertaining to species or a species.—Specious arithmetic, algebra: so called by old writers following Viète. The phrase implies that algebra is computation by means of species, or letters denoting quantities; but the choice of the name was probably influenced by the beauty of algebraic processes.—Specious logic. See logicistic.

Speciously (spē-shus-ly), adv. In a specious manner; with an appearance of fairness or of reality; with show of right: as, to reason speciously.

My dear Anacreon, you reason speciously, which is better in most cases than reasoning soundly; for many are led by it and none offended.

Landor, Imag. Conv., Anacreon and Polycrates.

speciousness (spē-shus-ness), n. The state or quality of being specious; plausible appearance; fair external show; as, the speciousness of an argument.

His theory owes its speciousness to packing, and to packing alone.
Macaulay, Sadler's Refutation Rebutted.

speck (spek), v. [< ME. specke, spekke, < AS. specca (pl. speccan), a spot, speck (also in comp. specc-fang, specked, spotted); cf. LG. spaken, spot with wet, spakig, spotted with wet; MD. specken, spit, speckel, n. spot, speckle: see speckle.] 1. A very small superficial spot or stain; a small dot, blot, blotch, or patch appearing on or adhering to a surface: as, specks of mold on paper; fly-specks on a wall.

He was wonderfully careful that his shoes and clothes should be without the least speck upon them.

Steele, Tatler, No. 48.

2. In fruit, specifically, a minute spot denoting the beginning of decay; a pit or spot of rot or rottenness; hence, sometimes, a fruit affected by rot.

The shrivelled, dwarfish, or damaged fruit, called by the street traders the specks.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 117.
The little rill within the lover's eye,
Or little pitted speck in garner'd fruit,
That rolling downward slowly moulders all.
Tennyson, Merlin and Vivien (song).

3. A patch or piece of some material.

But Robin did on the old man's cloak,
And it was torn in the neck;
"Now by my faith," said William Scarlett,
"Here should be set a speck."
Robin Hood and the Old Man (Child's Ballads, V. 255).

4. Something appearing as a spot or patch; a small piece spread out: as, a speck of snow or of cloud.

Come forth under the speck of open sky.
Hawthorne, Seven Gables, vi.

5. A distinct or separate piece or particle; a very little bit; an atom; a mite: as, specks of dust; a speck of snuff or of soot; hence, the smallest quantity; the least morsel: as, he has not a speck of humor or of generosity.

The bottom consisting of gray sand with black specks.
Lyon, Voyages, II. 7.

Still wrong bred wrong within her, day by day
Some little speck of kindness fell away.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 326.

6. A poreous fish, Fluoretra stigmata of Jordan, common in ponds of the hill-country from Georgia to Louisiana. It is a darter, 2½ inches long, of an olivaceous color, speckled with small orange spots, and otherwise variegated.—7. A speck-moth.

speck (spek), v. t. [< ME. specken; < speckl, n.] 1. To spot; mark or stain in spots or dots.

Wyclif, Gen. xxx. 32.
Each flower of slender stalk, whose head, though gay Cherished, purple, azure, or speck'd with gold, Hung drooping unsustained. Milton, P. L., ix. 420.

2. Of fruit, specifically, to mark with a discolored spot denoting decay or rot: usually in the past participle.

It seemed as if the whole fortune or failure of her shop might depend on the display of a different set of articles, or substituting a finer apple for one which appeared to be specked.
Hawthorne, Seven Gables, III.

speck (spek), n. [*Prop. *spick (the form speck being dial., and in part due to D. or G.); early mod. E. spycke, < ME. spik, spyk, spike, also assimilated spich, < AS. spic, bacon, = D. spek = MLG. spek = OHG. MHG. spec, G. speck = Icel. spik, lard, fat; prob. akin to Gr. πικρὸν (*pikrōn), = Zend pivāh = Skt. pivan, fat.] Fat; lard; fat meat. Now used chiefly as derived from the German in the parts of Pennsylvania originally settled by Germans, or from the Dutch in New York (also in South Africa, for the fat meat of the hippopotamus); among whalers it is used for whale's blubber.*

Adieu good Cheese and Oynens, stuff thy guts
With Specke and Barley-pudding for digestion.
Heywood, English Traveller, l. 2.

Speck (in Pennsylvania) is the hybrid offspring of English pronunciation and German Speck (pronounced schpeck), the generic term applied to all kinds of fat meat. Trans. Amer. Philol. Ass., XVII. App., p. xlii.

Speck and applejacks, pork fat and apples cut up and cooked together: an old-fashioned Dutch dish. Barlett.

speck-fall (spek'fāl), n. [< speck + fall.] In whaling, a full or rope rove through a block for hoisting the blubber and bone off the whale.
speckle (spek'li), n. [Early mod. E. also speckel (= D. spekkel, a speckle), with dim. -le, < speckl, n. Cf. speckle, v.] 1. A little speck or spot; a speckled marking; the state of being speckled: as, yellow with patches of speckle.

She curiously examined . . . the peculiar speckle of its plumage.
Hawthorne, Seven Gables, x.

2. Color; hence, kind; sort. [Scotch.]

As ye well ken, . . . "the waiges o' sta is deilil." But, mairly, . . . shiners get first waiges o' anither speckle frae the maister o' them.

G. Macdonald, Warlock o' Glenwarlock, xli.

speckle (spek'li), v. t.; pret. and pp. speckled, pp. speckling. [< MD. speckelen, speckelen, spot, speckle: see speckle, n.] To mark with specks or spots; fleck; speck; spot.

Seeing Alys, straight he [the bear] rushed at him,
Speckled with foam, bleeding in flank and hump.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 348.

speckle-belly (spek'li-bel'i), n. 1. The North American white-fronted goose, Anser albifrons gambeli: so called in California because the under parts are whitish, blotched and patched with black. Also called harlequin brant, speckled brant. See ent under laughing-goose.—2. The gull, or gray duck, Chauleasmus streperus. See ent under Chauleasmus. G. Trumbull, 1888. [Long Island.]—3. A trout or eel, as the common brook-trout of the United States, Salvelinus fontinalis. See ent under char.

speckled (spek'li), p. a. [< speckle + -ed.] 1. Spotted; specked; marked with small spots of indeterminate character; maculate; specifically noting many animals.

I will pass through all thy flock to day, removing from thence all the speckled and spotted cattle, and all the brown cattle among the sheep, and the spotted and speckled among the goats: and of each shall be my hire. Gen. xxx. 32.

Over the body they have built a Tomb of speckled stone,
A brace and balie high. Purcell, Pilgrimage, p. 271.

2. Variegated in appearance or character; diversified; untidy; piebald: as, a speckled company. [Colloq.]

It was a singularly frenked and speckled group.
S. Judd, Mergrove, l. 10.

Speckled alder. See alder, l. 1.—Speckled beauty. (n) A trout: a trite cant phrase. (b) A British geometrid moth, Cleora riduaria.—Speckled-bill, the speckled-billed teal, or speckle-coot: the wulf-duck, Edemia perspicillata. [New Eng.]—Speckled brant. Same as speckle-belly, l. 1.

—Speckled footman, a British homyid moth, Euleia eribroni.—Speckled leech, Hirudo or Sanguisuga medicinalis, one of the forms of medicinal leech.—Speckled loon. See loon.—Speckled terrapin. See terrapin.

speckledness (spek'li-ness), n. The state of being speckled.

speckled-tailed (spek'li-tāld), a. Having a speckled tail: specifically noting Thryothorus bewicki spilurus, a variety of Bewick's wren found on the Pacific coast of the United States, translating the word spilurus.

speckless (spek'les), a. [< speck + -less.] Free from specks or spots; spotless; fleckless; perfectly clean, clear, or bright: as, speckless linen; a speckless sky.

These gleamed resplendent in the dimness of the corner a complete and speckless pewter dinner service.

New Princeton Rev., II. 111.

speck-moth (spek' mōth), n. One of certain geometrid moths, as Eupithecia subfulvata, the tawny speck: an English collectors' name.

speckioneer (spek-shō-nōr'), n. [Also speckioneer; appar. orig. a humorous term, irreg. < speck + -ion + -er (with allusion to inspection and engineer).] In whale-fishing, the chief harpooner: so called as being the director of the cutting operations in clearing the whale of its speck or blubber and bones.

In a rough, careless way, they spoke of the speckioneer with admiration enough for his powers as a sailor and harpooner.

Mrs. Gaskett, Sylvia's Lovers, xix.

specky (spek'i), a. [< speck + -y.] Having specks or spots; slightly or partially spotted.

The tonsils were full, and the left one specky.
Lancet, No. 3494, p. 334.

specs, specks (speks), n. pl. A colloquial contraction of spectacles.

spectable (spek'tā-bl), a. [ME. spectable, < OF. spectabile = Sp. espectable = Pg. espectavel = It. spettabile, notable, remarkable, < L. spectabilis, that may be seen, visible, admirable, < spectare, see, behold: see spectacle.] That may be seen; visible; observable.

There are in hem certayne signes spectable,
Which is to escheue, and which is profitable.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. L. T. S.), p. 123.

Their [the Pharisees'] prayers were at the corners of streets; such corners where divers streets met, and so more spectable to many passengers.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 104. (Darwin.)

spectacle (spek'tā-kl), n. [< ME. spectacle, spectacle, < OF. (and F.) spectacle = Sp. espectaculo = It. spettacolo = D. spektakel, spectacle, show, = G. Dan. spektakel, noise, uproar, = Sw. spektakel, spectacle, noise, < L. spectaculum, a show, spectacle, < spectare, see, behold, freq. of specere, see: see species.] 1. An exhibition; exposure to sight or view; an open display; also, a thing looked at or to be looked at; a sight; a gazing-stock; a show; especially, a deplorable exhibition.

A Doughhill of dead carcases he spyde,
The dreadful spectacle of that sad house of Pryde.
Spenser, F. Q., I. v. 53.

So exquisitely was it [a crucifix] form'd that it represented in a very lively manner the lamentable spectacle of our Lord's Body, as it hung upon the Cross.

Maunder, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 72.

How much we forgive in those who yield us the rare spectacle of heroic manners! Emerson, Conduct of Life.

2. Specifically, a public show or display for the gratification of the eye; something designed or arranged to attract and entertain spectators; a pageant; a parade; as, a royal or a religious spectacle; a military or a dramatic spectacle.

The stately semi-religious spectacle in which the Greeks delighted.
J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., I. 324.

Thurgh which he may his verray frendes see.
Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 347.

5. pl. A pair of lenses set in a frame adjusted to the eyes, to correct or improve defective vision; also, sometimes, a similar frame with pieces of plain white or colored glass to protect the eyes from glare or dust; commonly called a pair of spectacles. The frame was in former times usually of horn or tortoise-shell, and afterward of *Spectacles.

A, spectacles with bows hinged to the shoulders on the rims connected by the nose or bridge. B, spectacles with hook-bows and with bridge and shoulders riveted to the lenses. C, detail showing construction of shoulder. D, side view, showing rim. In all the figures: a, bows; b, shoulders; c, rims; d, bridge.

silver; it is now usually of steel or of gold. It is made up of the "bridge," "rims" (or frames of the lenses), "bows," and "sides" or "temples"; but the bows are now often omitted. The frame is so constructed and adjusted as to rest on the nose and ears and hold the lenses in the proper position. Spectacles which are supported on the nose only, by means of a spring, are commonly called eye-glasses. Spectacles with convex lenses are for the aged, or farsighted; and spectacles with concave lenses are for the near-sighted. In both cases the value of spectacles depends upon their being accurately adapted to the person's vision. Spectacles with colored lenses, as green, blue, violet-tinted, or smoke-color, are used to protect the eyes from a glare of light. Divided spectacles have each lens composed of two parts of different foci nearly united, one part for observing distant objects, and the other for examining objects near the eye. Another kind, called periscope spectacles, are intended to allow the eyes considerable latitude of motion without fatigue. The lenses employed in this case are of either a meniscus or a concavo-convex form, the concave side being turned to the eye. Spectacles with glazed wings or frames partly filled with crape or wire gauze are used to shield the eyes from dust, etc.

He [Lord Crawford] sat upon a couch covered with deer's hide, and with spectacles on his nose (then a recent invention) was laboring to read a huge manuscript called the Rosier de la Guerre. Scott, Quentin Durward, vii.

6. pl. Figuratively, visual aids of any kind, physical or mental; instruments of or assistance in seeing or understanding; also, instruments or means of seeing or understanding otherwise than by natural or normal vision or perception: as, rose-colored spectacles; I cannot see things with your spectacles.

And even with this I lost fair England's view,
And bid mine eyes be packing with my heart,
And call'd them blind and dusky spectacles,
For losing ken of Albion's wished coast.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 2. 112.

Subjects are to look upon the faults of princes with the spectacles of obedience and reverence to their place and persons.

Donne, Sermons, ii.

Shakespeare . . . was naturally learn'd; he needed not the Spectacles of Books to read Nature; he look'd inwards, and found her there.

Dryden, Essay on Dram. Poesy (1693), p. 31.

7. pl. In zoöl., a marking resembling a pair of spectacles, especially about the eyes: as, the spectacles of the cobra. See cut under cobra-de-capello.

A pair of white spectacles on the eyes, and whitish about base of bill.

Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 815.

Compound spectacles. (a) Spectacles fitted for receiving extra colored glasses, or to which additional lenses can be attached to vary the power. (b) A form of spectacles having in each bow two half glasses differing in power or character; divided spectacles. See def. 5.—Franklin spectacles. Same as pantoscopic spectacles (which see, under pantoscopic).

spectacled (spek'tā-klid), a. [< spectacle + -ed.] 1. Furnished with or wearing spectacles.

The bleared sights

Are spectacled to see him. Shak., Cor., ii. 1. 222.

Porphyro upon her face doth look,
Like puzzled urchin on an aged crone
Who keepeth closed a wondrous riddle-book,
As spectacled she sits in chimney-nook.
Keats, Eve of St. Agnes, xv.

2. In zoöl.: (a) Marked in any way that suggests spectacles or the wearing of spectacles: as, the spectacled bear or cobra. (b) Spectable or spectacular; being "a sight to behold"; spectral: as, the spectacled shrimp.—Spectacled bear Ursus or Tremarctos ornatus, the only South American bear, having a light-colored mark on the face, like a pair of spectacles.—Spectacled cobra, any specimen of the common Indian cobra, Naja tripudians, which has the markings of the back of the hood well developed so as to resemble a pair of spectacles. See cut under cobra-de-capello.—Spectacled coot, spectacled duck, the surf-scooter or duck, Edemia perspicillata; the goggle-nose. [Conneftent.]—Spectacled elder, Sonateris (Arctonetta) fisheri, an elder-duck of the northwest coast of America, having in the male the eyes set in silvery-white plumage rimmed with black.—Spectacled goose, gull-lemot, snake, stenoderm. See the nouns.—Spectacled shrimp, the specter- or skeleton-shrimp, a caprellid. See Caprella.—Spectacled vampire. Same as spectacled stenoderm.

spectacled-headed (spek'tā-klid-hed'ed), a. Having the head spectacled: applied to flies of the genera Holococephala (family Asilidae) and Diopsis and Sphyracephala (family Diopsidae). See cut under Diopsis.

A queer-looking, spectacled-headed, predatory fly. . . . The head is unusually broad in front, the eyes being very prominent and presenting a spectacled or goggled appearance.

C. H. Tyler Townsend, Proc. Entom. Soc.

[of Washington, I. 254.]

spectacle-furnace (spek'tā-klid-fēr'nās), n. A literal translation of the German brillenofen, which is a variety of the spurofen, a form of shaft-furnace of which the essential peculiarity is that the melted material runs out upon the inclined bottom of the furnace into a crucible-like receptacle or pot outside and in front of the furnace-stack. This sort of furnace has been used at Mansfeld and in the Harz, but apparently not in any English-speaking country.

spectacle-gage (spek'tā-kl-gāj), n. A device used in fitting spectacles to determine the proper distance between the glasses.

spectacle-glass (spek'tā-kl-glās), n. 1. Glass suited for making spectacles; optical glass.—2. A lens of the kind or form used in spectacles.—3†. A field-glass; a telescope.

As 1678 he added a spectacle-glass to the shadow-vane of the lesser arch of the Sea-quadrant.

Aubrey, Lives (Edmund Halley).

spectacle-maker (spek'tā-kl-mā'kēr), n. A maker of spectacles; one who makes spectacles, eye-glasses, and similar instruments. The Spectacle-makers' Company of London was incorporated in 1630.

spectacle-ornament (spek'tā-kl-ōr'nā-ment), n. A name given to an ornament, often found in sculptured stones in Scotland, consisting of two disks connected by a band: the surface so marked out is often covered with interlaced whorl-ornaments.

spectacular (spek-tak'ū-lār), a. [< L. spectacularis, a sight, show (see spectacle), + -ar.] 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of a show or spectacle; marked or characterized by great display: as, a spectacular drama.

The spectacular sports were concluded.
Hicks, Sermon, Jan. 30, 1681.

2. Pertaining to spectacles or glasses for assisting vision. [Rare.]

spectacularity (spek-tak'ū-lār'i-ti), n. [< spectacular + -ity.] Spectacular character or quality; likeness to or the fact of being a spectacle or show.

It must be owned that when all was done the place had a certain spectacularity; the furniture and ornaments wore somehow the air of properties.

Hovells, Private Theatricals, x.

spectacularly (spek-tak'ū-lār-ly), adv. In a spectacular manner or view; as a spectacle.

The last test was spectacularly, the best of the afternoon.
Sci. Amer., N. S., LVII. 380.

spectant (spek'tant), a. [< L. spectant (t-s), pp. of spectare, look at, behold, freq. of specere, look at, behold: see spectacle, species.] In her.: (a) At gaze. (b) Looking upward with the nose bendwise: noting any animal used as a bearing.

spectate (spek'tāt), v. t. and i. [< L. spectatus, pp. of spectare, see, behold: see spectant.] To look about or upon; gaze; behold. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Coming on the Bridge, a Gentleman sitting on the Couch civilly salutes the Spectating Company; the turning of the wheels and motion of the horses are plainly seen as if natural and alive.

Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, I. 237.

Mr. De Quincey—Works, VI. 329—has spectate: and who can believe that he went anywhere but to spectate for it?
F. Hall, False Philol., p. 76.

spectation (spek-tā'shōn), n. [< L. spectatio (n-), a beholding, contemplation, < spectare, pp. spectatus, look at, behold: see spectant.] Look; aspect; appearance; regard.

This simple spectation of the lungs is differentiated from that which concomitates a pleurisy.

Harvey.

spectator (spek-tā'tor), n. [Early mod. E. spectator; < F. spectateur = Sp. espectador = It. spettatore, < L. spectator, a beholder, < spectare, pp. spectatus, look at, behold: see spectant.] One who looks on; an onlooker or eyewitness; a beholder; especially, one of a company present at a spectacle of any kind: as, the spectators of or at a game or a drama.

We, indeed, appeared to be the only two unconcerned spectators on board; and, accordingly, were allowed to ramble about the decks unnoticed.

B. Hall, Travels in N. A., II. 10.

=Syn. Looker-on, onlooker, observer, witness, by-stander. A person is said to be a spectator at a show, a bull-fight, a wrestling-match; one of the audience at a lecture, a concert, the theater; and one of the congregation at church.

spectatorial (spek-tā-tō-ri-āl), a. [< spectator + -ial.] Pertaining to or characteristic of a spectator. [In the quotation it is used with direct reference to the name of the periodical cited.]

There is a vicious terror of being blamed in some well-inclined people, and a wicked pleasure in suppressing them in others; both which I recommend to your spectatorial wisdom to annihilate upon.

Steele, Spectator, No. 348.

spectatorship (spek-tā'tor-ship), n. [< spectator + -ship.] The act of looking or beholding; the state or occupation of being a spectator or looker-on.

Guess . . . If thou standest not I the state of hanging, or of some death more long in spectatorship.

Shak., Cor., v. 2. 71.

Bathing in the sea was the chief occupation of these good people, including, as it did, prolonged spectatorship of the process.

H. James, Jr., Confidence, xix.

spectatress (spek-tā'tres), n. [< spectator + -ess. Cf. spectatrix.] A female spectator or looker-on.

Helen, in the night when Troy was sack'd, Spectatress of the mischief which she made.

Keats, Fair Penitent, v. 1.

spectatrix (spek-tā'triks), n. [= F. spectatrice = It. spettatrice, fem. of spectator, a beholder: see spectator.] Same as spectatress.

specter, spectre (spek'tér), n. [< OF. (and F.) spectre = Sp. Pg. espectro = It. spettro, an image, figure, ghost, < L. spectrum, a vision, appearance, apparition, image, < specere, see: see species, spectacle. Cf. specter.] 1. A ghostly apparition; a visible incorporeal human spirit; an appearance of the dead as when living. Specters are imagined as disembodied spirits haunting or revisiting the scenes of their mundane life, and showing themselves in intangible form to the living, generally at night, from some overpowering necessity, or for some benevolent or (more usually) malevolent purpose. They are sometimes represented as speaking, but more commonly as only using terrifying or persuasive gestures to induce compliance with their wishes. The word is rarely used for the disassociated soul of a living person.

The ghosts of traitors from the bridge descend,
With bold fantastic spectres to rejoice.

Drayton, Annus Mirabilis, st. 222.

One of the afflicted,
I know, bore witness to the apparition
Of ghosts unto the spectre of this Bishop, Saying, "You murdered me!"

Longfellow, Giles Corey, III. 2.

A fine traditional spectre pale,
With a turnip head and a ghostly wail,
And a splash of blood on the decay?

W. S. Gilbert, Haunted.

2. In zool.: (a) One of many names of grossorial orthopterous insects of the family Phasmidae; a walking-stick or stick-insect; a specter-insect. (b) The specter-bat. (c) The specter-lemur. (d) A specter-shrimp.—Specter of the Brocken, an optical phenomenon named from the Brocken, a mountain of the Harz range, where it has been most frequently observed. It consists of the shadow of the observer cast on a sunrise or sunset in apparently gigantic size upon the mist or fog about the mountain-summit. The shadow is sometimes enclosed in a prismatic circle called the Brocken bow, and again is bordered with a colored fringe. Howitt states that, if the fog is very dry, one sees not only one's self, but one's neighbor; if very damp, only one's self, surrounded by a rainbow-colored glory. Also Brocken specter.—Byz. L. Apparition, Phantom, etc. See ghost.

specter-bat (spek'tér-hat), n. The spectral bat, a South American leaf-nosed bat or vampire, Phyllostoma spectum, or a similar species.

specter-candle (spek'tér-kan'dl), n. A straight fossil cephalopod, as a baculite, belemnite, or orthoceratite. These and similar objects have often been superstitiously regarded, in ignorance of their origin and nature. See betyllus, salpingina, and thunder-stone.

specter-crab (spek'tér-krit), n. A glass-crab; one of the larval forms which were called Phyllosouata. See cut under glass-crab.

specter-insect (spek'tér-in'sekt), n. Same as specter, 2 (a).

specter-lemur (spek'tér-lé'mér), n. The tarsier, Tarsius spectrum. See cut under tarsier.

specter-shrimp (spek'tér-shrimp), n. A small lamodipod crustacean of the family Caprellidae, as Caprella tuberculata; a skeleton-shrimp; so called from the singular form and aspect.

spectra, u. Plural of spectrum.

spectral (spek'tral), a. [= F. spectral, < L. spectrum, specter: see specter.] 1. Of or pertaining to a specter; resembling or having the aspect of a specter; ghostlike; ghostly.

Some of the spectral appearances which he had been told of in a winter's evening. Scott, Bride of Lammermoor, xlii.

To his excited fancy everything assumed a spectral look. The shadows of familiar things about him stalked like ghosts through the haunted chambers of his soul.

Longfellow, Hyperion, iv. 3.

Spectral in the river-mist

The ship's white timbers show.

Whittier, The Shipbuilders.

2. Pertaining to ocular spectra, or pertaining to the solar, prismatic, or diffraction spectrum; exhibiting the hues of the prismatic spectrum; produced by the aid of the spectrum: as, spectral colors; spectral analysis.

It is important to be able to observe the varying effects of pressure and density upon spectral phenomena.

J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 75.

3. In zool., like or likened to a specter or apparition; suggestive of a ghost in any way: as, the spectral bat; spectral shrimps; spectral insects.—Spectral lemur, the tarsier.—Spectral owl, Syrian cinereus, or Strix cinerea, the great gray owl of nettle America, remarkable for having more plumage in proportion to the size of the body than any other owl.

spectrality (spek'tral'i-ti), n.; pl. spectralities (-tiz). [< spectral + -ity.] The state of being spectral; a spectral being or object. [Rare.]

What is he doing here in liquidatorial sanctity, with nothing but ghostly spectralities prowling round him?

Carlyle, Sterling, I. 1. (Daries.)

spectrally (spek'tral-i), adv. In a spectral manner; like a ghost or specter.

spectre, u. See specter.

spectroholometer (spek'trō-hō-lom'e-tér), n. [< NL. spectrum, spectrum, + E. holometer.]

An instrument consisting of a holometer in combination with a spectroscopic, used in the study of the distribution of heat in the solar spectrum and in similar investigations. The absorbing surface of the holometer is an extremely slender strip of platinum, and it is so mounted that this can be moved at will to any desired part of the spectrum, the amount of heat received being measured, as usual, by the deflection of a galvanometer-needle.

spectrograph (spek'trō-gráf), n. [< NL. spectrum + Gr. γράφω, write.] An apparatus designed to give a representation of the spectrum from any source, particularly one in which photography is employed; a spectroscopic in which a sensitive photographic plate takes the place of the eyepiece of the observing telescope.

spectrographic (spek'trō-gráf'ik), a. [< spectrograph + -ic.] Pertaining to a spectrograph or the observations made with it; specifically, relating to the process or results of photography as applied to the study of spectra.

Spectrographic operations are, as Professor Young well says, much more sensitive to atmospheric conditions than are visual observations.

D. Todd, Science, III. 727.

spectrography (spek'trō-gráf'i), n. [< spectrograph + -y.] The art of using the spectrograph.

spectrological (spek'trō-lōj'i-kal), a. [< spectral + -ic.] Of or pertaining to spectrology; performed or determined by spectrology; as, spectrological analysis.

spectrology (spek'trō-lōj'i), n. [< NL. spectrum + Gr. λογία, < λόγος, speak; see -ology.] That branch of science which determines the constituent elements and other conditions of bodies by examination of their spectra.

spectrometer (spek'trō-mē'ter), n. [< NL. spectrum, spectra, + L. metrum, measure.] An instrument used chiefly to measure the angular deviation of light-rays in passing through a prism, and hence to determine the refractive indices of the substance of which the prism is formed. Its essential parts are—(1) a tube (see figure), having a slit at the further end through which the light is thrown by the mirror M, and a collimating lens at the other end to convert the divergent pencil into a parallel beam; (2) the prism P, which can be turned upon the central axis, its position being centered by two slides moved at right angles to each other by means of the screws E and F; (3) the observing telescope A, the eyepiece of which is provided with cross-wires so that the position of a given line can be accurately fixed; the axis of the telescope can be made horizontal by the screw N. After the position of the prism has been accurately adjusted, usually so as to give the minimum deviation for the given ray, the angle of deviation is measured by the telescope moving with the graduated circle C, while the prism (with the vernier) is stationary. By the tangent screws at O and Q the positions of the two circles can be adjusted more delicately. The instrument can also be used, like the ordinary reflecting goniometer (it is then a spectrometer-goniometer), to measure the angle between the two faces of the prism, which angle, with that of the minimum deviation, is needed to give the data for calculating the required refractive index. (See refraction.) If a diffraction-grating instead of a prism is employed, the telescope A is moved into the position A', making a small angle with the tube B; the instrument may then be used to measure the wave-length of a given light-ray.

spectrometrie (spek'trō-met'rik), a. [< As spectrometer + -ic.] Pertaining to a spectrometer or the observations made with it.

spectromicroscopical (spek'trō-mi-krō-skop'i-kal), a. [< NL. spectrum + E. microscopical.] Pertaining to spectroscopic observations made in connection with the microscope.

The spectro-microscopical apparatus, especially in the hands of botanists, has become an important instrument in the investigation of the coloring matter of plants.

Behrens, Meros. In Botany (trans.), II. 139.

spectrophone (spek'trō-fōn), n. [< NL. spectrum + Gr. φωνή, sound.] An adaptation of the principle of the radiophone, devised by Bell to be used in spectrum analysis. It consists of a spectroscopic eyepiece of which is removed—the sensitive substances being placed in the focal point behind an opaque diaphragm containing a slit, while the ear is in communication with the substances by means of a hearing-tube. See the quotation.

Suppose we smoke the interior of our spectrophonle receiver, and fill the cavity with peroxide of nitrogen gas. We have then a combination that gives us good sounds in all parts of the spectrum (visible and invisible) except the ultra violet. Now pass a rapidly interrupted beam of light through some substances whose absorptive spectrum is to be investigated, and bands of sound and silence are observed in exploring the spectrum, the silent positions corresponding to the absorption bands.

A. G. Bell, in Philosph. Mag., 6th ser., II. 527, 1881.

spectrophonic (spek'trō-fōn'ik), a. [< As spectrophone + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the spectrophone, or investigations made by means of it.

spectrophotometer (spek'trō-fō-tōm'e-tér), n. [< NL. spectrum + E. photometer.] An instrument used to compare the intensities of two spectra (as from the limb and center of the sun), or the intensity of a given color with that of the corresponding color in a standard spectrum. It is based upon the fact that the eye is very sensitive to slight differences of intensity between two similar colors when brought side by side. It consists essentially of a spectroscopic arranged with total reflecting prisms, so that, for example, the spectra to be compared can be brought into immediate juxtaposition, while Nicol prisms in the path of the pencils of rays make it possible to diminish the intensity of the brighter light until the two exactly correspond. The angular position of the analyzing prism gives the means of obtaining the required relation in intensity.

spectrophotometrie (spek'trō-fō-tō-met'rik), a. [< As spectrophotometer + -ic.] Pertaining to the spectrophotometer, to its use, or to observations made with it.

spectrophotometry (spek'trō-fō-tōm'e-tri), n. [< As spectrophotometer + -y.] The art of using the spectrophotometer.

spectropolariscope (spek'trō-pā-lar'i-skōp), n. [< NL. spectrum + E. polariscope.] A combination of the spectroscopic and the polariscope, an instrument sometimes used in the analysis of sugar. It is a modification of a form of the saccharimeter.

spectropyrometer (spek'trō-pi-rōm'e-tér), n. [< NL. spectrum + E. pyrometer.] An instrument devised by Crova for measuring high temperatures, based upon the principle that two incandescent bodies of the same radiating power have the same temperature when their spectra are identical in extent. It is essentially a form of spectrophotometer.

spectroscope (spek'trō-skōp), n. [< NL. spectrum + Gr. σκοπεῖν, view.] An instrument used to produce a spectrum of the light (or, more generally, the radiation) from any source by the passage of the rays through a prism or their reflection from a grating, and for the study of the spectrum so formed. In its common form the essential parts of the prismatic spectroscope are—(1) a tube with a slit at the further end (see fig. 1), through which the light enters, and at the other end a collimating lens which brings the rays into a parallel beam (the slit is formed between two parallel edges the distance between which can be varied at will); (2) a prism to refract and disperse the rays, or a series or train of prisms when greater dispersion is desired—a gain, however, which is accompanied by a serious diminution in the intensity of the light; (3) a telescope through which the magnified image of the spectrum thus formed is viewed. A third tube is usually added, containing a scale, which is illuminated by a small gas-flame and reflected from the surface of the prism into the telescope, thus giving the means of fixing the position of the lines observed. A small glass comparison prism is often placed in front of half the slit, and through it, by total reflection, a second beam of light can be introduced, the spectrum of which is seen directly over the other. An instrument which gives a spectrum when the source of the light is in a straight line with the eye—that is, which gives dispersion without deviation—is called a direct-vision spectroscope (see

fig. 2); this may be accomplished by combining two crown-glass prisms, with a third flint-glass prism of an angle of Spectroscopes.

90° between them (fig. 3). For certain rays—for example, the yellow—there is no divergence while a spectrum is obtained, since the dispersion of the flint-glass prism in one direction is greater than that of the two crown-glass prisms in the opposite direction. Other forms of direct-vision spectroscopes have also been devised. In the grating spectroscope, or diffraction spectroscope, a diffraction-grating (a series of very fine parallel lines ruled on glass or speculum-metal) takes the place of the prism; and the parallel rays falling upon it are reflected, and form a series of diffraction-spectra (see diffraction, grating, 2, and interference, 5), which are called normal spectra (see spectrum, 3), since the dispersion of the rays is proportional to their wave-length. A prism is sometimes used before the telescope to separate parts of the successive spectra which would otherwise overlap. If a Rowland grating (see diffraction) is employed, the arrangements can be much simplified, since the large concave surface of the grating forms an image directly, which may be received upon a screen, or for study upon a photographic plate, or viewed through an eyepiece with cross-wires to fix the position of the lines observed. The grating is supported at one end of a rigid bar, in practice about 21 feet in length, at the other end of which, and at the center of curvature of the concave surface, is the eyepiece or support for the sensitive plate. The ends of this bar rest on carriages moving on two rails at right angles to each other; and, as the end carrying the eyepiece is moved, the whole length of the spectrum (several feet) may be successively observed, the fixed beam of parallel rays from the slit falling upon the grating as its position is slowly turned. The whole apparatus is mounted on rigid supports in a room from which all light but that received through the slit is carefully excluded. A high degree of dispersion is thus obtained, combined with the advantage of the normal spectrum, and the further advantages that the amount of light employed is large, while the disturbing effect of the absorption of the material of the prisms is avoided. See further under spectrum.—Analyzing spectroscopic, integrating spectroscopic, terms applied to the spectroscopic (X-ray) to describe its use, with or without a lens throwing an image of the luminous object upon the slit. In the former case, different parts of the slit are illuminated by light from different parts of the object, and their spectra can be separately compared, or, in other words, the light is thus analyzed; while in the second case, when the collimator is pointed toward the source of light, the combined effect of the whole is obtained.—Half-prism spectroscopic, a spectroscopic in which the beam of rays enters the prism at right angles to one face, and suffers dispersion only on emerging from the face opposite and inclined to it. The half-prism ordinarily employed is half of a compound prism such as is used in the direct-vision spectroscopic.—Rainband-spectroscopic. See rainband.

spectroscopic (spek'trō-skōp), v. i. and t.; prot. and pp. spectroscoped, ppr. spectroscoping. [< spectroscopic, n.] To use the spectroscopic; study by means of observations with the spectroscopic. C. Piazzi Smyth, Trans. R. S. E., XXXII. 521. [Rare.]

O. W. Holmes, Atlantic Monthly, XLIX. 387.

spectroscopic (spek'trō-skōp'ik), a. [< spectroscopic + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or performed by means of the spectroscopic or spectroscopy; as, spectroscopic analysis; spectroscopic investigations.

spectroscopical (spek'trō-skōp'i-kəl), a. [< spectroscopic + -al.] Same as spectroscopic.

spectroscopically (spek'trō-skōp'i-kəl-i), adv. In a spectroscopic manner; by the use of the spectroscopic.

spectroscopist (spek'trō-skōp'ist), n. [< spectroscopic + -ist.] One who uses the spectroscopic; one skilled in spectroscopy.

spectroscopy (spek'trō-skō-pi), n. [As spectroscopic + -y.] That branch of science, more particularly of chemical and physical science, which is concerned with the use of the spectroscopic and with spectrum analysis.

spectrum (spek'trūm), n.; pl. spectra (-trā). [< NL. spectrum, a spectrum, < L. spectrum, an appearance, an image or apparition: see specter.] 1. A specter; a ghostly phantom.—2. An image of something seen, continuing after the eyes are closed, covered, or turned away. If, for example, one looks intently with one eye upon any colored object, such as a wafer placed on a sheet of white paper, and immediately afterward turns the same eye to another part of the paper, one sees a similar spot, but of a different color. Thus, if the wafer is red, the seeming spot will be green; if black, it will be changed into white. These images are also termed ocular spectra.

3. In physics, the continuous band of light (visible spectrum) showing the successive prismatic colors, or the isolated lines or bands of color, observed when the radiation from such a source as the sun, or an ignited vapor in a gas-flame, is viewed after having been passed through a prism (prismatic spectrum) or reflected from a diffraction-grating (diffraction- or interference-spectrum). The action of the prism (see prism and refraction) is to refract the light and at the same time to separate or disperse the rays of different wave-lengths, the refraction and dispersion being greater as the wave-length diminishes. The grating (see grating, 2), which consists usually of a series of fine parallel lines (say 10,000 or 20,000 to the inch) ruled on speculum-metal, diffracts and at the same time disperses the light-rays, forming a series of spectra whose lengths depend upon the fineness of the lines. If, now, a beam of white light is passed through a slit, and then by a collimator lens is thrown upon a prism, and the light from this received upon a screen, a colored band will be obtained passing by insensible degrees, from the less refrangible end, the red, to the more refrangible end, the violet, through a series of colors ordinarily described as red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, and violet. A similar effect is obtained from a grating, with, however, this difference, that in the prismatic spectrum the red covers only a small part relatively of the colored band, since the action of the prism is to crowd together the less refrangible rays and separate the more refrangible rays of less wave-length, and thus distort the spectrum. The diffraction-spectrum, on the other hand, shows the red occupying about the same space as the blue and violet, and is called a normal spectrum. When the light from different sources is studied in the spectroscopic, it is found, first, that a solid or a liquid when incandescent gives a continuous spectrum, and this is true of gases also at great pressures; second, bodies in the gaseous form give discontinuous spectra, consisting of colored bright lines (line-spectrum) or bands (band-spectrum), or of bands which under certain conditions appear as channelled spaces or flutings (fluted spectrum), and these lines or bands for a given substance have a definite position, and are hence characteristic of it; third, if light from an incandescent solid or liquid body passes through a gas at a lower temperature than the incandescent body, the gas absorbs the same rays as those its own spectrum consists of; therefore, in this case, the result is a spectrum (absorption-spectrum) continuous, except as interrupted by black lines occupying the same position as the bright lines in the spectrum of the gas itself would occupy. An absorption-spectrum, showing more or less sharply defined dark bands, is also obtained when the light has passed through an appropriate liquid (as blood), or a solid such as a salt of didymium (see further under absorption). For example, the spectrum from a candle-flame is continuous, being due to the incandescent carbon particles suspended in the flame. If, however, the yellow flame produced when a little sodium is inserted in the non-luminous flame of a Bunsen burner is examined, a bright-yellow line is observed; if a red lithium flame, then a red and a yellow line are seen; the red strontium flame gives a more complex spectrum, consisting of a number of lines, chiefly in the red and yellow; and so of other similar substances. For substances like iron, and other metals not volatile except at very high temperatures, the heat of the voltaic arc is employed, and by this means their spectra, often consisting of a hundred or more lines (of iron at least 2,000), can be mapped out. Still again, if the light from the sun is studied in the same way, it is found to be a bright spectrum from red to violet, but crossed by a large number of dark lines called Fraunhofer lines, because, though earlier seen by Fraunhofer (1802), they were first mapped by Fraunhofer in 1814; this name is given especially to the more prominent of them, which he designated by the letters A to H, etc. (See the figures.) These lines, as explained above, are due to the absorption by gases, either in the sun's atmosphere or in that of the earth. When the light is passed through a train of prisms, or reflected from a Rowland grating, and thus a very high degree of dispersion obtained, the rays are more widely separated and the spectrum can be more minutely examined. Studied in this way, it is found that the dark lines in the solar spectrum number many thousands, the greater part of which can be identified in the spectra of known terrestrial substances. Thus, the presence in the sun's atmosphere of thirty-six elements has been established (Rowland, 1891); these include sodium, potassium, calcium, magnesium, iron, copper, cobalt, silver, lead, tin, zinc, titanium, aluminum, chromium, silicon, carbon, hydrogen, etc. The radiation from the sun consists not only of those rays whose wave-length is such as to produce the effect of vision upon the eye, but also of others of greater wave-length than the red rays and less wave-length than the violet; the spectrum from such a source consequently includes, besides the luminous part, an invisible part (invisible spectrum) below the red, called the infra-red region, and another beyond the violet, called the ultra- violet. The first region is also present in the spectrum from any hot body, and the latter in that from a body at a high temperature—for example the incandescent carbons of an arc electric light. Thus, Langley by means of his bolometer has proved the existence of rays having a wave-length nearly twenty times that of the luminous red rays, in the radiation of the surface of the moon, and corresponding to a temperature not far from that of melting ice. Further, while the visible spectrum includes rays separated by only about one octave (since the wave-length for the extreme red is approximately twice that of the extreme violet), the full spectrum, from the extreme ultra-violet to the longest waves recognized by the bolometer, embraces more than seven octaves. In other words, it extends from rays having a wave-length of 0.18 of a micron = 0.000018 millimeter, to those whose wave-length is 30 microns (1 micron = 0.000001 millimeter). The invisible regions of the spectrum cannot be directly studied by the eye, but they can be explored, first by photography, it being possible to prepare suitable plates sensitive to the infra-red as well as others sensitive to ultra-violet rays, and such photographs show the presence of many additional absorption-lines. The invisible infra-red region (heat-spectrum) can also be explored by the thermopile and still better the bolometer, and the distribution of the heat thus examined, and a thermogram of the spectrum constructed in which the presence of "cold" absorption-bands is noted. Still again, the method of phosphorescence is employed to give a phosphorograph of the spectrum, while fluorescence is made use of in studying the ultra-violet region. In studying the invisible heat-spectrum lenses and prisms of rock-salt must be used, because the dark rays of long wave-length are largely absorbed by glass; further, in investigating the invisible ultra-violet region quartz is similarly employed, since it is highly transparent to these short wave-length vibrations. In many investigations it is of great advantage to use the grating-spectroscopic, especially one provided with a concave Rowland grating, since then the normal spectrum (fig. II.) is obtained directly without the use of the usual lenses and prisms, and hence free from their absorbing effects. Recent photographs of the solar spectrum obtained by Prof. Rowland in this way give a clearness of definition combined with high dispersion never before approached. Thus, in their enlarged form as published (1890), the double sodium-lines are widely separated, and sixteen distinct fine lines may be counted between them. It was formerly the custom to divide the solar spectrum into three parts, formed by the invisible heat-rays, the luminous rays, and the so-called chemical or actinic rays. This threefold division of the spectrum is, however, largely erroneous, since all the rays of the spectrum are "heat-rays" if they are received upon an absorbing surface, as lampblack; and, while it is true that the chemical change upon which ordinary photography depends is most stimulated by the violet and ultra-violet rays, this is not true universally of all chemical changes produced by direct radiation. The rays from the lowest end of the spectrum to the highest differ intrinsically in wave-length only, and the difference of effect observed is due to the character of the surface upon which they fall. The spectra of the stars, of the comets, nebulae, etc., can be studied in the same way as the solar spectrum, and the result has been to throw much light upon the constitution of these bodies; the spectrum of the aurora has been similarly examined. In addition to its use in the study of cosmic physics, spectrum analysis has proved a most delicate and invaluable method to the chemist and physicist in the examination of the different elements and their compounds. By this method of research a number of new elements have been detected (as rubidium, cesium, indium, thallium); and recently the study of the absorption-spectra of the earth—obtained from samarskite, gadolinite, and other related minerals—has served to show the existence of a group of closely related elements whose existence had not before been suspected. Further, the study of the change in the spectra of certain elements under different conditions of temperature has led Lockyer to some most important and suggestive hypotheses as to the relation between them and their possible compound nature.

4. [cap.] [NL.] In zool., a generic name variously used: (a) A genus of lepidopterous insects. Scopoli, 1777. (b) A genus of grossorial orthopterous insects: same as Phasma. Stoll, 1787. (c) A genus of lemuroid mammals: same as Tarsius. Lacépède, 1803.—5. The specific name of some animals, including Tarsius spectrum and Phyllostoma spectrum.—Fluted spectrum. See def. 3.—Gitter-spectrum, a diffraction-spectrum. See def. 3.—Grating-spectrum. See grating, 2.—Herschelian rays of the spectrum. See Herschelian.—Secondary spectrum, the residual or secondary chromatic aberration observed in the use of an ordinary so-called achromatic lens (see achromatic), arising from the fact that while by combining the crown- and flint-glass two of the colors of the spectrum are brought to the same focus, the dispersion of the others is not equally compensated. By using new kinds of glass which allow of proportional dispersion in different parts of the spectrum (see apochromatic), Abbe has made lenses which collect three colors to one focus, leaving only a small residual aberration uncorrected, which is called the tertiary spectrum.

speculable (spek'ū-lə-bəl), a. Knowable.

specular (spek'ū-lār), a. [= F. spéculaire = Pr. specular = Sp. Pg. especular = It. speculare, < L. specularis, belonging to a mirror, < speculum, a mirror: see spectrum.] 1. Of or pertaining to a mirror; capable of reflecting objects: as, a specular surface; a specular mineral; specular metal (an alloy prepared for making mirrors).—2. Assisting or facilitating vision; serving for inspection or observation; affording a view: as, a specular orb (the eye or a lens); specular stone (an old name for mica used in windows, in Latin specularis lapis); a specular tower (one serving as a lookout). [Archaic.]

You teach (though we learn not) a thing unknown
To our late times, the use of specular stone,
Through which all things within without were shown.
Doine, To the Countess of Bedford.

Look once more, ere we leave this specular mount.
Milton, P. R., iv. 236.

Calm as the Universe, from specular towers
Of heaven contemplated by Spirits pure.
Wordsworth, Cavo of Staffa.

3. In ornith., of or pertaining to the speculum of the wing; ocellar: as, the specular area; specular iridescence.—Specular iron ore, a variety of hematite, or anhydrous iron sesquioxide, occurring in crystals and massive forms with a brilliant metallic luster. Finely pulverized and washed, it is used as a polishing-powder.

Specularia (spek'ū-lā'ri-ā), n. [NL. (Heister, 1748), < L. speculum in speculum Feneris, 'Venus's looking-glass,' a medieval name of S. speculum, from the resemblance of its flowers set on their cylindrical ovary to the ancient round bronze mirror at the end of a straight handle: see speculum.] A genus of gamopetalous plants of the order Campanulaceae. It is distinguished from the allied genus Campanula by its wheel-shaped or shallow and broadly bell-shaped corolla and linear or narrowly oblong ovary. There are about 8 species, natives of the northern hemisphere, chiefly of southern and central Europe, with one in South America. They are annual herbs, either erect or decumbent, and smooth or bristly. They bear alternate entire or toothed leaves, and blue, violet, or white two-bracted flowers nearly or quite sessile in the axils. S. speculum is the Venus's looking-glass, formerly in favor in English gardens; S. hybrida is there known as the corn-violet; and S. perfoliata, native in the United States, is remarkable for its dimorphic flowers, the earlier being minute and eliotogamic.

speculate (spek'ū-lūt), v.; prot. and pp. speculated, pp. speculating. [< L. speculatus, pp. of speculari, spy out, watch, observe, behold (< It. speculari = Sp. Pg. especular = OF. speculer, F. spéculer), < specula, n watch-tower, < specere, see: see species. Cf. speculum.] I. trans. 1. To view as from a watch-tower or observatory; observe.

I shall never eat garrle with Diogenes in a lab, and speculate the stars without a shirt.

Shirley, Grateful Servant, II. 1.

2. To take a discriminating view of; consider attentively; speculate upon; examine; inspect: as, to speculate the nature of a thing. [Rare.]

We . . . conceit ourselves that we contemplate absolute existence when we only speculate absolute privation.

Sir W. Hamilton, Discussions, p. 21.

II. intrans. 1. To pursue truth by thinking, as by mathematical reasoning, by logical analysis, or by the review of data already collected. —2. To take a disursive view of a subject or subjects; note diverse aspects, relations, or probabilities; meditate; conjecture: often implying absence of definite method or result.

I certainly take my full share, along with the rest of the world, . . . in speculating on what has been done, or is doing, on the public stage.

Burke, Rev. in France.

3. To invest money for profit upon an uncertainty; take the risk of loss in view of possible gain; make a purchase or purchases, as of something liable to sudden fluctuations in price or to rapid deterioration, on the chance of selling at a large advance: as, to speculate in stocks.

speculation (spek'ū-lā'shon), n. [< OF. speculation, speculation, F. speculation = Pr. speculacio = Sp. especulación = Pg. especulação = It. speculazione, < L. speculatio (n.), a spying out, exploration, observation, contemplation, < L. speculari, view: see speculate.] 1. The act or state of speculating, or of seeing or looking; intelligent contemplation or observation; viewing; inspection. [Obsolete or archaic, but formerly used with considerable latitude.]

Thence (from the works of God) gathering plumes of perfect speculation.

To impe the wings of thy high flying mynd,
Mount up aloft through heavenly contemplation.

Spenser, Heavenly Beauty, I. 131.

Thou hast no speculation in those eyes Which thou dost glare with.

Shak., Macbeth, III. 4. 95.

I am arrived to that perfection in speculation that I understand the language of the eyes.

Steele, Spectator, No. 251.

2. The pursuit of truth by means of thinking, especially mathematical reasoning and logical analysis; meditation; deep and thorough consideration of a theoretical question. This use of the word, though closely similar to the application of speculatio in the Latin of Boethius to translate theoria, is chiefly due to 1 Cor. xii. 12, "now we see through a glass, darkly," where "glass" is in the Vulgate speculum. But some writers, as Milton and Cowper, associate the meaning with specula, 'a watch-tower.'

For practice must agree with speculation, Belief & knowledge must guide operation.

Finch's Whistle (E. L. T. S.), p. 147.

Thenceforth to speculations high or deep
I turn'd my thoughts.

Milton, P. L., ix. 602.

John sense unto reason, and experiment unto speculation.

Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., II. 5.

From him [Pythagoras] Socrates derived the principles of virtue and morality, . . . and most of his natural speculations.

Sir W. Temple, Ancient and Modern Learning.

The brilliant fabric of speculation erected by Darwin can scarcely sustain its own weight.

Darwin, Nature and the Bible, p. 240.

3. In philos., sometimes, a purely a priori method of philosophizing: but commonly in philosophy the word has the meaning 2, above.

—4. The investing of money at a risk of loss on the chance of unusual gain; specifically, buying and selling, not in the ordinary course of commerce for the continuous marketing of commodities, but to hold in the expectation of selling at a profit upon a change in values or market rates. Thus, if a merchant buys in for his regular trade a much larger stock than he otherwise would because he anticipates a rise in price, this is not termed speculation; but if he buys what he does not usually deal in, not for the purpose of extending his business, but for the chance of a sale of the particular articles at a profit by reason of anticipated rise, it is so termed. In the language of the exchanges, speculation includes all dealing in futures and options, whether purchases or sales.

The establishment of any new manufacture, of any new branch of commerce, or of any new practice in agriculture, is always a speculation from which the projector promises himself extraordinary profits.

Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, I. x. 1.

A vast speculation had failed,
And ever he muller'd and madden'd.

Tennyson, Maud, I. 3.

5. A game at cards, the leading principle of which is the purchase of an unknown card on the calculation of its probable value, or of a known card on the chance of no better appearing during the game, a part of the pack not being dealt. Latham. = Syn. 2. Hypothesis, etc. See theory.

speculatist (spek'ū-lā-tist), n. [< speculate + -ist.] A speculative philosopher; a person who, absorbed with theoretical questions, pays little attention to practical conditions.

Such speculatists, by expecting too much from friendship, dissolve the connection.

Goldsmith, Friendship.

Presb confluence the speculatist takes For every bare-brain'd project he makes.

Cowper, Progress of Error.

speculative (spek'ū-lā-tiv), a. [= F. spéculatif = Sp. Pg. especulativo = It. speculativo, < L. speculativus, pertaining to or of the nature of observation, < L. speculari, view: see speculate.] 1. Pertaining to or affording vision or outlook: n. meaning influenced by Latin specula, 'a watch-tower.'

Now roves the eye:

And, posted on this speculative height,
Exults in his command.

Cowper, Task, I. 259.

2. Looking; observing; inspecting; prying.

My speculative and oilied instrument.

Shak., Uthello, I. 3. 271.

To be speculative into another man, to the end to know how to work him or what him or govern him, proceedeth from a heart that is double and cloven.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, I.

3. Given to speculation; contemplative; theoretical.

He [Washington] was not a speculative, but a practical man; not at all devoted to Ideas.

Theodore Parker, Historic Americans, Washington, p. 114.

Speculative men are deemed unsound and frivolous.

Emerson, Misc., p. 12.

4. Purely scientific; having knowledge as its end; theoretical: opposed to practical; also (limiting a noun denoting a person and signifying his opinions or character), in theory, and not, or not merely, in practice; also, cognitive; intellectual. In this sense (which has no connection with speculation), speculative translates Aristotle's θεωρητικός. Thus, speculative science is science pursued for its own sake, without immediate reference to the needs of life, and does not exclude experimental science.

I do not think there are so many speculative atheists as men are wont to imagine.

Boyle, Christian Virtuoso, part I.

It is evidently the intention of our Maker that man should be an active and not merely a speculative being.

Acad. Active Powers, Int.

When astronomy took the form of a speculative science, words were invented to denote distinctly the conceptions thus introduced.

Wheatell, Philos. of Inductive Sciences, I. III.

A distinction merely speculative has no concern with the most momentous of all practical controversies.

J. K. Seelye, Nat. Religion, p. 51.

5. Inferential; known by reasoning, and not by direct experience: opposed to intuitive; also, improperly, purely a priori. This meaning was introduced into Latin by Anselm, with reference to 1 Cor. xii. 12, where the Vulgate has speculum. Speculative cognition is cognition not intuitive.

6. Pertaining or given to speculation in trade; engaged in speculation, or precarious ventures for the chance of large profits; of the nature of financial speculation: as, a speculative trader; speculative investments or business.

The speculative merchant exercises no one regular, established, or well-known branch of business.

Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, I. x. 1.

Speculative geometry, philosophy, reason, theology, etc. See the nouns.

speculatively (spek'ū-lā-tiv-ly), adv. In a speculative manner; as or by means of speculation, in either the intellectual or the material sense.

speculativeness (spek'ū-lā-tiv-ness), n. The state of being speculative, or of consisting in speculation.

speculativism (spek'ū-lā-tiv-izm), n. [< speculative + -ism.] The tendency to speculation or theory, as opposed to experiment or practice; a theorizing tendency. Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 269. [Recent.]

speculator (spek'ū-lā-tor), n. [= F. spéculateur = Sp. Pg. especulador = It. speculatore, < L. speculator, an explorer or scout, a searcher, an investigator, < speculari, pp. speculatus, spy out, watch, observe, view: see speculate.] 1. An observer or onlooker; a watcher; a lookout; a seer; in a specific use, an occult seer; one who looks into mysteries or secrets by magical means.

All the boats had one speculator, to give notice when the fish approached.

Droome.

2. One who engages in mental speculation; a person who speculates about a subject or subjects; a theorizer.

The number of experiments in moral science which the speculator has an opportunity of witnessing has been increased beyond all calculation.

Macaulay, History.

3. One who practices speculation in trade or business of any kind. See speculation, 4.

speculatorial (spek'ū-lā-tō'ri-āl), a. [< L. speculatorius, pertaining to a scout or observer (see speculatio), + -al.] Speculatio.

speculatio (spek'ū-lā-tō'ri), a. [< L. speculatio, pertaining to a scout or observer, < speculari, pp. speculatus, spy out, watch, observe, view: see speculate.] 1. Practising or intended for oversight or outlook; overseeing; overlooking; viewing.

My privileges are an ubiquitous, circumambulatory, speculatio interrogatory, redargutory immunity over all the privy lodgings.

Carew, Caelum Britannicum.

Both these [Roman encampments] were nothing more than speculatio outposts to the Akeman-street.

T. Warton, Hist. Riddlestone, p. 68.

2. Given to, or of the nature or character of, speculation; speculative. [Rare.]

speculatrix (spek'ū-lā-triks), n.; pl. speculatrices (spek'ū-lā-trī'sēz). [L., fem. of speculator; see speculator.] A female speculator. [Rare.]

A communion with invisible spirits entered into the general creed [in the sixteenth century] throughout Europe, and crystal or beryl was the magical medium. . . . Persons even of ordinary rank in life pretended to be what they termed speculators, and sometimes women were speculatrices.

J. D'Iraqui, Ancien. of Lit., II. 297.

speculum (spek'ū-lum), n.; pl. specula (-lā), sometimes speculums (-lumz). [< L. speculum, a mirror, a copy or imitation (cf. specula, a watch-tower, lookout, < specere, look at, behold: see species).] 1. Something to look into or from; specifically, a mirror or looking-glass. —2. An attachment to or part of an optical instrument, as a reflecting telescope, having a brightly polished surface for the reflection of objects. Specula are generally made of an alloy called speculum-metal, consisting of ten parts of copper to one of tin, sometimes with a little arsenic to increase its whiteness. Another speculum alloy is made of equal weights of steel and platinum. Specula are also made of glass covered with a film of silver on the side turned toward the object.

3. In ornith.: (a) An ocellus or eye-spot, as of a peacock's tail. See ocellus, 4. (b) The mirror of a wing, a specially colored area on some of the flight-feathers. It is usually iridescent-green, purple, violet, etc., and formed by a space of such color on the outer webs of several secondaries, toward their end, and commonly set in a frame of different colors formed by the tips of the same secondaries or of the greater wing-coverts, or of both. Sometimes it is dead-white, as in the gadwall. A speculum occurs in various birds, and as a rule in ducks, especially the Anatidae, being in these so constant and characteristic a marking that some breeds of game-fowls are named duckwing in consequence of a certain resemblance in the wing-markings. See silver-duckwing. Also called mirror. See cuts under Chaulelasmus and mallard.

speculum

The wing (In Anatine) has usually a brilliant Speculum, which, like the other wing-markings, is the same in both sexes. Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 696.
4. In anat., the septum lucidum of the brain. See cut under corpus.—5. In med. and surg., an instrument used for rendering a part accessible to observation, especially by opening or enlarging an orifice.—6. A lookout; a place to spy from.

A, eye-speculum; B, Sims's vaginal speculum; C, bivalve vaginal speculum; D, ear-speculum.

It was in fact the speculum or watch-tower of Teufelsdröckh; wherefrom, sitting at ease, he might see the whole life-circulation of that considerable City. Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, l. 3.

Duck-billed speculum, a name sometimes applied to Sims's vaginal speculum, whose valves resemble a duck's bill. Also called duck-bill.—Ear-speculum, an instrument, usually a hollow cone, introduced into the meatus externus for holding the hairs out of the way so that the bottom of the passage may be illuminated and seen.—Nose-speculum. See rhinoscope.

speculum-metal (spek'ŭ-lum-met'ŭl), n. See speculum, 2.

sped (sped). A preterit and past participle of speed.

spedit, spedeful. Old spellings of speed, speedful.

speecet, n. An old form of speed, spice.

speech (spēch), n. [Early mod. E. also speach; < ME. speche, spæche, earlier spek, speke, < AS. spēc, spēce, earlier spriec, spriec (= OS. sprāca = OE. fries. sproke, spretse, sprake = D. spraak = MLG. sprake = OHG. sprāha, MHG. G. sprache = Icel. spækjur, f. pl. = Sw. språk = Dan. sprog), speech, < sprecan (pret. spræc), speak; see speak.] 1. The faculty of uttering articulate sounds or words, as in human beings and, by imitation, in some birds; capacity for expressing thoughts by words or articulate sounds; the power of speaking, or of uttering words either in the speaking- or the singing-voice.

And they bring unto him one that was deaf, and had an impediment in his speech. Mark vii. 32.

Speech is the instrument by which a Fool is distinguished from a Philosopher.

Hicell, Forreino Travell (rep. 1869), p. 59.

God's great gift of speech abused Makes thy memory confused.

Tennyson, A Dirge.

2. The action or exercise of speaking; expression of thoughts or ideas with the speaking-voice; oral utterance or communication; also, an act or exercise of oral expression or communication; talk; conversation; discourse; as, a person's habit of speech; to be chary of speech; their speech was all about themselves.

There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard. [There is no speech nor language; their voice cannot be heard, R. V.] Ps. xix. 3.

Without more Speche I yon beseeche
That we were some gone.

The Nut-Brown Maid (Percy's Reliques, II. l. 6).

We entered into many speeches of divers matters.

Coryat, Crudities, l. 14.

3. The words and grammatical forms in which thought is expressed; language; a language.

For thou art not sent to a people of a strange speech. Ezek. iii. 5.

There is not a language in the world which does not exist in the condition of dialectic division, so that the speech of each community is the member of a more or less extended family. Whitney, Life and Growth of Lang., p. 175.

4. That which is spoken; thoughts as uttered or written; a saying or remark; especially, a more or less formal address or other utterance; an oration; a harangue; as, a cutting speech in conversation; the speeches in a dialogue or a drama; to deliver a speech; a volume of speeches.

You may spare your speeches: I expect no reply.

Steele, Tatler, No. 203.

At the end of his speech he [Chatham] fell in an apoplectic fit, and was borne home to die a few weeks afterward. Amer. Cyc., XIII. 552.

5. A speaking or talking of something; uttered opinion, intention, etc.; oral or verbal mention; report. [Archaic.]

5813

Winthrop, Hist. New England, l. 460.

6. An occasion of speaking; course of speaking; oral communication; colloquy; conference; parlance; as, to get speech of or with a person.

I would by and by have some speech with you.

Shak., M. for M., iii. l. 155.

Look to it that none have speech of her.

Scott, Kenilworth, xxxiv.

7. Manner of speaking; form or quality of that which is spoken or of spoken sounds; method of utterance, either habitual or occasional; as, his speech betrays his nationality; rapid speech; thick or harsh speech.

As thou wouldest be cleane in arraye,

So be cleane in thy speech.

Deepest Book (L. E. T. S.), p. 90.

Thou art a Galilean, and thy speech agreeth thereto.

Mark xiv. 70.

8. The utterance or sounding of a musical instrument, especially of a pipe in a pipe-organ.

In the 11th century . . . the manner of testing the speech [of an organ] by blowing the pipe with the mouth in various ways is precisely that often employed by the "voicer" of the present day. Grove, Diet. Music, II. 573.

9. In a wheel, the hub with the spokes, but without the felices and tire. E. H. Knight.—Figure of speech. See figure.—Maiden, oblique, perfect speech. See the adjectives.—Part of speech. See part.—Reported speech. Same as oblique speech.—Rule of speech. See rule.—Scanning speech. See scan.—Set speech. See set.—Speech from the throne, in British politics, a speech or address prepared by the ministry in the name of the sovereign, and read at the opening of Parliament either by the sovereign in person or by commission. It states briefly the relations with foreign countries and the condition of domestic affairs, and outlines vaguely the chief measures which will be considered by Parliament. Also called king's (or queen's) speech. = Syn. Speech, Address, Harangue, Oration. Speech is generic, and applies to any form of words uttered; it is the thing spoken, without reference to its quality or the manner of speaking. It is a speech viewed as spoken to one or more persons, and is generally of the better sort; as, Paul's speech on Mars' Hill; his speech before Felix.

A harangue is a noisy speech, usually unstudied and unpolished, addressed to a large audience and in a violent manner. An oration is a formal, impressive, studied, and elaborately polished address; as, Webster was selected to deliver the oration when the corner-stone of the Bunker Hill monument was laid, and again when the monument was completed. See sermon and language.

speecht (spēch), v. i. [< speech, n.] To make a speech; harangue.

He raved continually, . . . and speecht against him from morning till night.

Account of T. Whigg, Esq., p. 9. (Latham.)

speech-center (spēch'sen'tēr), n. A nervous center particularly related to speech; especially, a cortical center situated in the region of the posterior extremity of the left frontal convolution of the brain, the destruction of which produces in most persons ataxic aphasia.

speechcraft (spēch'krāft), n. The art or science of language; grammar. Burton.

speech-crier (spēch'krī'er), n. Formerly, in Great Britain, a hawk of the last speeches or confessions of executed criminals, accounts of murders, etc. As a distinct occupation, such hawkling arose from the frequency of public executions when hanging was the penalty for a great variety of crimes.

speech-day (spēch'dā), n. In England, the periodical examination-day of a public school.

I still have . . . the gold étui your papa gave me when he came to our speech-day at Kensington.

Thackeray, Virginians, xxi.

Of the fond and faithful creature?

Blackie, Lays of the Highlands, p. 18.

speechification (spē'chi-fi-kā'shŭn), n. [< speechify + -ation (see -fication).] The act of making speeches or of haranguing. [Humorous or contemptuous.]

speechifier (spē'chi-fi-ēr), n. [< speechify + -er.] One who speechifies; one who is fond of making speeches; a habitual speechmaker. [Humorous or contemptuous.]

A county member . . . both out of the house and in it, is liked the better for not being a speechifier.

George Eliot, Daniel Deronda, xlv.

speechify (spē'chi-fi), v. i.; pret. and pp. speechified, ppr. speechifying. [< speech + -ify.] To make a speech; harangue. [Humorous or contemptuous.]

At a political dinner everybody is disagreeable and inclined to speechify. Dickens, Sketches, Scenes, xix.

speed

speechless (spēch'les), a. [< speech + -less.] 1. Not having or not using the faculty of speech; unable to speak; dumb; mute.

He that never hears a word spoken, . . . it is no wonder if such an one remain speechless.

Holder, Elements of Speech, p. 115.

2. Refraining or restrained from speech; not speaking, either of purpose or from present inability; as, to stand speechless before one's accusers; speechless from terror.

I had rather hear your groans than find you speechless.

Brome, Queens Exchange, ii.

3. Characterized by the absence of speech; unexpressed; unattended by spoken words.

From her eyes

I did receive fair speechless messages.

Shak., M. of V., i. l. 164.

4. Using few words; concise. Hallivell. speechlessly (spēch'les-li), adv. Without speaking; so as to be incapable of utterance: as, speechlessly amazed.

speechlessness (spēch'les-nes), n. The state of being speechless; muteness.

speechmake (spēch'māk), v. i. [A back-formation, < speechmaking.] To indulge in speechmaking; make speeches. [Rare.]

Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, iii. 445.

II.† intrans. To tell; tell a story; give an account.

Now of marshalle of halle wylle I spelle,
And what falle to lye offyce now wylle y telle.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 310.

spell<sup>2</sup> (spel), v.; pret. and pp. spelled or spelt, ppr. spelling. [late ME. spellen; a particular use of spell<sup>1</sup>, tell, appar. duo to D. use: MD. spellen, declare, explain, explain in detail or point by point, spell, D. spellen, spell; cf. OF. espeller, espeler, declare, spell, F. épeler, spell, = Pr. espelar, espelhar, declare (< G. or D.): see spell<sup>1</sup>. The word is in part confused, as the var. speal also indicates, with spell<sup>4</sup>, speld<sup>1</sup>, spelder, a splinter, because a splinter of wood was used as a pointer to assist in spelling words: see spell<sup>4</sup>, and cf. spelder, v., spell.] 1. I. trans. 1. To tell or set forth letter by letter; set down letter by letter; tell the letters of; form by or in letters.

Spellyn (letters). Syllabico. Prompt. Parv., p. 468.

A few commonplace and ill-spelled letters, a few wise or witty words, are all the direct record she has left of herself.
The Century, XL. 648.

2. To read letter by letter, or with laborious effort; hence, to discover by careful study; make out point by point: often with out or over.

I will sit on this footstool at thy feet, that I may spell over thy splendour, and learn for the first time how princes are nithred.
Scott, Kenilworth, vii.

He was a perfect specimen of the Trullibbers of old; he smoked, hunted, drank beer at his door with his grooms and dogs, and spelled over his county paper on Sundays.
Sydney Smith, in Lady Holland, vii.

3. To constitute, as letters constitute a word; make up.

The Saxon heptarely, when seven kings put together did spell but one in effect.
Fulter.

To spell backward, to repeat or arrange the letters of in reverse order; begin with the last letter of; hence, to understand or explain in an exactly contrary sense; turn inside out; reverse the character or intention of.

I never yet saw man,

How wise, how noble, young, how rarely featured,
But she would spell him backward.
Shak., Much Ado, III. 1. 61.

To spell baker, to do something difficult: supposed to refer to baker as one of the first words met by children in passing from the "easy" monosyllables to the "hard" dissyllables in the old spelling-books. [Old and colloq., U. S.] If an old man will marry a young wife,
Why then—why then—why then—he must spell Baker.
Longfellow, Giles Corey, II. 1.

II. intrans. 1. To form words with the proper letters, in either reading or writing; repeat or set down the letters of words.

O, she knew well
Thy love did read by rote and could not spell.
Shak., R. and J., II. 3. 88.

2. To make a study; engage in careful contemplation of something. [Poetical and rare.]

Where I may sit and rightly spell
Of every star that heaven doth shew,
And every herb that sips the dew.
Milton, Il Penseroso, l. 170.

spell<sup>3</sup> (spel), v. t. [ME. spelen, speltien, < AS. spelian, act in one's stead, take one's place, also rarely spilian, play, jest, = OS. spilôn, play, dance, = D. spelen = MLG. D. spel = MLG. spil, LG. spile, play, music, performance, cards, = OHG. MHG. spil, G. spiel, play, game; root unknown.] To take the place of (another person) temporarily in doing something; take turns with; relieve for a time; give a rest to.

Sometimes there are two ostensible bidders [slaves in charge of sugar-bolling] to spell and relieve one another.

When one is obliged to be spelled for the purpose of natural rest, he should leave his injunctions to a judicious negro. T. Roughley, Jamaica Planters' Guide (1823), p. 340.

Mrs. Savor kept her seat beside Annie. Shosald, "Don't you want I should spell you a little while, Miss Kilburn?" Hovells, Annie Kilburn, xvi.

spell<sup>3</sup> (spel), n. [< spell<sup>3</sup>, v.] 1. A turn of work or duty in place of another; an interval of relief by another person; an exchange of work and rest: as, to take one's regular spell; to work the pumps by spells.

Their toil is so extreme as they can not endure it above four hours in a day, but are succeeded by spells.

Carew, Survey of Cornwall, fol. 11.

A poor old negro, whose woolly head was turned to gray, though scarcely able to move, begged to be taken in, and offered to give me a spell when I became tired.

B. Hall, Travels in N. A., I, 188.

Hence—2. A continuous course of employment in work or duty; a turn of occupation between periods of rest; a bout.

We read that a working day [in Holland] of thirteen or fourteen hours is usual; a spell of eighteen or more hours is not uncommon. The Academy, July 27, 1889, p. 54.

3. An interval of rest or relaxation; a turn or period of relief from work; a resting-time.

A halt was made for the purpose of giving the horses a spell and having a pot of tea.

A. C. Grant, Bush Life in Queensland, I, 42.

4. Any interval of time within definite limits; an unbroken term or period.

Nothing new has happened in this quarter since my last, except the settling in of a severe spell of cold weather and a considerable fall of snow.

Washington, To J. Reed, Dec. 25, 1774.

After a grievous spell of eighteen months on board the French galleys. R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xla.

5. A short period, indefinitely; an odd or occasional interval; an uncertain term; a while. [Colloq.]

No, I hain't got a girl now. I had one a spell, but I'd rather do my own work.

C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 145.

Why don't ye come and rest a spell with me, and to-morrow ye kin go on ef ye like? Harpur's Map, LXXX, 310.

6. A bad turn; an uncomfortable time; a period of personal ailment or ill feeling. [Colloq., U. S.]

Wal, arter all, we sot out, and Hopsy, she got clear heat out; and when Hopsy does get heat out she has spells, and she goes on awful, and they last day arter day.

H. B. Stone, Oldtown, p. 171.

spell<sup>1</sup> (spel), n. [Also spill, spcal, formerly spall; partly a var. of speld (see speld), partly < D. spil, the pin of a bobbin, spindle, axis (see spindle). Cf. spall, spal.] 1. A chip, splinter, or splint. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

Cf. spelt or spilt, originally a chip of wood for lighting a candle.

William of Palerne (W. E. T. S.), Gloss., p. 305.

2. In the game of nur-and-spell, the steel spring by which the nur is thrown into the air.—3. One of the transverse pieces at the bottom of a chair which strengthen and keep together the legs. [Hallivell, [Prov. Eng.]

spellable (spel'q-bl), a. [< spell<sup>2</sup> + -able.] Capable of being spelled, or represented in letters: as, some birds utter spellable notes. Carlyle, Misc., IV, 69. [Darvies.] [Rare.]

spellbind (spel'bind), v. t. [A back-formation, after spellbound; < spell + bind.] To bind by or as if by a spell; hold under mental control or restraint; fascinate. [Recent.]

Now the poor French word . . . "Qu'en dira-t-on?" spellbinds us all. Carlyle, Essays (J. F. F. Hilder again).

The other, in his speech about the banner, spellbound his audience until they swore that such a speech was never heard till then.

Holbeck, Lanny.

spellbinder (spel'bin-dér), n. One who spellbinds or fascinates; especially, an eloquent political orator. [U. S. political slang, first used in the presidential campaign of 1888.]

spell-bone (spel'bôn), n. [< spell + bone.] The small bone of the leg; the fibula. See phrases under peroneal. [Hallivell, [Prov. Eng.] spellbound (spel'bound), a. Bound by or as if by a spell; entranced; rapt; fascinated.

My dear mother stood gazing at him, spellbound by his eloquence.

R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, II.

speller<sup>1</sup> (spel'er), n. [< ME. spellere; < spell<sup>1</sup> + -er.] A speaker or talker; a teller; a narrator.

Speke we of the spellere holde, 8ith we have of this lady tolde.

Cursor Mundi, MS. Coll. Trin. Cantab., f. 127. [Hallivell.]

speller<sup>2</sup> (spel'er), n. [< late ME. spellare (= MD. D. spellen), a spell; < spell<sup>2</sup> + -er.] 1. One who spells, as in school; a person skilled in spelling.

Spellare, syllabicator. Prompt. Parv., p. 463.

2. A book containing exercises or instructions in spelling; a spelling-book.

speller<sup>3</sup> (spel'er), n. [< spell<sup>4</sup> + -er.] A branch shooting out from the crown of a deer's antler. See out under Dama. Cotgrave.

spellful (spel'fûl), a. [< spell<sup>1</sup> + -ful.] Full of spells or charms; fascinating; absorbing. Hoole, tr. of Orlando Furioso, xv. [Rare.]

As we telle yn owre spelling, Falsenes come never to gode endyng. MS. Cantab. Ff. II. 38, f. 125. (Hallivell.)

spelling<sup>2</sup> (spel'ing), n. [< into ME. spellunge (= MD. spellunge, D. spelling); verbal n. of spell<sup>2</sup>, v. Cf. D. spelkunst (kunst, art), spelling; buchstabiren, spell, as a noun, spelling (< buch-stabe, a letter: see under book); Sw. stafning = Dan. staving, spelling (see staff, stave); and cf. orthography.] 1. The act of one who spells; the manner of forming words with letters; orthography.

Spellinge, syllabicator. Prompt. Parv., p. 463. Our common spelling is often an untrustworthy guide to etymology. J. Halley, Essays, p. 350.

To prepare the way for such a change [a reform in spelling] the first step is to break down, by the combined influence of enlightened scholars and of practical educators, the immense and stubborn prejudice which regards the established modes of spelling almost as constituting the language, as having a sacred character, as in themselves preferable to others. All action and all definite proposals of reform are to be welcomed so far as they work in this direction. Proc. Amer. Philol. Assoc., VII, 35.

It may be observed that it is mainly among the class of half-taught dabblers in philology that etymological spelling has found its supporters. All true philologists and philological bodies have uniformly denounced it as a monstrous absurdity, both from a practical and a scientific point of view. II. Sweet, Handbook of Phonetics, p. 201.

2. A collocation of letters representing a word; a written word as spelled in a particular way.

Our present spelling is in many particulars a far from trustworthy guide in etymology, and often, indeed, entirely falsifies history. Such spellings as Island, author, delight, sovereign, require only to be mentioned, and there are hundreds of others involving equally gross blunders, many of which have actually corrupted the spoken language. II. Sweet, Handbook of Phonetics, p. 200.

Phonetic spelling. See phonetic.—Spelling reform, the improvement by regulation and simplification of the conventional orthography of a language, specifically of the English language; the proposed simplification of English orthography. The spelling of all languages having a recorded history tends to lag behind the changes of pronunciation, and in time a reform becomes necessary. In English, since the gradual fixation of the spelling after the invention of printing, the separation of spelling and pronunciation has become very wide, and numerous proposals for spelling reform have been made. The present organized effort for spelling reform has arisen out of the spread of phonography, which is based on phonetic spelling, and from the more recent spread of the study of comparative philology, which is also based on phonetics. Proposals for a gradual reform in spelling have been put forth jointly by the American Philological Association and the Philological Society of England, and are advocated by the Spelling Reform Association. Amended spellings have been accepted to some extent by various periodicals, and are admitted, less freely, into recent books. Movements for spelling reform exist also in France, Germany, Denmark, and other countries. A spelling reform has been accomplished in Dutch, Spanish, and other tongues, and to some extent, by government action, in Germany.

spelling-bee (spel'ing-bê), n. Same as spelling-match.

spelling-book (spel'ing-bûk), n. A book from which children are taught to spell.

spelling-match (spel'ing-mech), n. A contest for superiority in spelling between two or more persons or parties. A formal spelling-match is usually between sides or sets of persons chosen by two leaders. Any person who mispells one of the words given out retires, and the victory belongs to the side that has the larger number left at the close. Also called spelling-bee. [U. S.] spellkent (spel'ken), n. [Also spellken; < D. spel, play (see spell<sup>1</sup>), + E. ken, a resort.] A playhouse; a theater. [Low slang.]

tre, spelt; < LL. spelta, spelt.] A kind of wheat commonly known as Triticum Spelta, but believed to be a race of the common wheat, Triticum sativum (T. vulgare). Spelt is marked by the fragile rachis of the spike, which easily breaks up at the joints, and by the grains being adherent to the chaff. It was cultivated by the Swiss lake-dwellers, by the ancient Egyptians, and throughout the Roman empire, and is still grown in the colder mountainous regions of Europe and elsewhere. It makes a very fine flour, used especially for pastry-making, but the grain requires special machinery for grinding.

spelt<sup>2</sup> (spelt), n. [< ME. spelt; a var. of speld.] A splinter, splint, or strip; a spell or spill.

The spekes was splentide alle with speltis of silver, The space of a spere lenghe springande fulle faire. Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), I, 3263.

Blisse that spall my honde I *spenn*ed. Aliteraire Poeme (ed. Morris), I, 49.

spencer<sup>2</sup> (spen'sér), n. [Named after Earl Spencer (1782-1845). The surname is derived from spencer<sup>1</sup>, spencer.] 1. A man's outer garment or overcoat so short that the skirts of the body-coat worn under it were seen: a fashion introduced about 1800.—2. A woman's garment introduced a year or two later, and made in direct imitation of the above. It also was short, and formed a kind of over-jacket, reaching a little below the waist.

spencer<sup>3</sup> (spen'sér), n. Naut., a trapezoidal fore-and-aft sail set abaft the foremast and mainmast; a trysail.

spencer-gaff (spen'sér-gaf), n. The gaff to which the spencer is bent.

Spencerian (spen-sér'i-an), a. [< Spencer (see def.) + -ian.] Pertaining or relating to the English philosopher Herbert Spencer (born 1820), or characteristic of his philosophical system. See Spencerianism.

Spencerianism (spen-sér'i-an-izm), n. The philosophy of Herbert Spencer, called by him the synthetic philosophy. Like almost all the ancient and a considerable part of the modern philosophical systems, it is a philosophy of evolution; but it differs from most of these in reducing evolution to the rank of a mere secondary principle, and in making the immutable law of mechanics the sole fundamental one. Spencer has formally stated his philosophy in sixteen propositions, which concern the relations of evolution and dissolution. These are of a special and detailed character, so that he does not countenance the claim made for him of the principle of evolution itself. His sixteen propositions states that under the sensible appearances which the universe presents to us, and "transcending human knowledge, is an unknown and unknowable power."

spency (spen'si, n.; pl. spencies (-siz). The stormy petrel, Procellaria pelagica. C. Swainson. [Shetland Isles.]

Lytell Geste of Robyn Hode (Child's Ballads, V. 87).

spendthrift (spend'thrift), n. and a. [< spend<sup>1</sup>, v., + obj. thrift.] I. n. One who spends lavishly, improvidently, or foolishly; an unthrifty spender; a prodigal.

What pleasure can the miser's fondled hoard,
Or spendthrift's prodigal excess, afford?
Cotter, In Memory of John Thornton.

II. a. Wastefully spending or spent; lavish; improvident; wasteful; prodigal: as, a spendthrift heir; spendthrift ways.

And then this "should" is like a spendthrift sigh,
That hurts by easing.
Shak., Hamlet, iv. 7. 123.

Spendthrift alike of money and of wit.
Cotter, Table-Talk, I. 634.

spendthriftly (spend'thrif'ti), a. [< spendthrift + -ly.] Lavish; wasteful; prodigal. [Rare.]

Spendthriftly, unclean, and ruffian-like courses.
Rogers, Naaman the Syrian, p. 611.

spense (spens), n. [Also spence; < ME. spense, spence, < OF. spense, spence, spense, expense, expenso (see expense); in ME. partly by aphesis from dispende, < OF. despende, expense, also a larder, buttery, etc., < despendre, spend: see expense, dispende, and cf. spend<sup>1</sup>, spenser.] 1†. Expense; expenditure of money.

So he sped hym by spices, & spense of his gode,
That the lady for hir lord lynely he stale.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 13692.

For better is cost upon somewhat worth than spense upon nothing worth.
Ascham, Toxophilus (ed. 1864), p. 115.

2. A buttery; a larder; a cellar or other place where provisions are kept. [Obsolete and prov. Eng.]

Al vinolent as bottle in the spence.
Chaucer, Summoner's Tale, l. 223.

Yn the spence, a tabell planke, and ij. sylwes [shelves].
English Gilda (E. E. T. S.), p. 327.

Bluff Harry broke into the spence,
And turn'd the cows adrift.
Tennyson, Talking Oak.

3. The apartment of a house where the family sit and eat. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.] spenser (spen'sér), n. [Also spencer; Se. spensar; < ME. spensere, speneere, spensere, also dispenser, < OF. despencier, dispensier (ML. dispensarius), dispenser, spenser, < despense, expense: see dispenser, spense.] Hence the surnames Spencer, Spenser.] A steward or butler; a dispenser.

Cesar heet his spenser zeve the Greke his money.
Trevia, tr. of Higden's Polychronicon, IV. 309.

The spencer came with keyes in his hand,
Opened the doore and them at dinner fand.
Henryson, Moral Fables, p. 12.

Spenserian (spen-sē'ri-an), a. and n. [< Spenser (see def. and spenser) + -ian.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the English poet Edmund Spenser (died 1599); specifically, noting the style of versification adopted by Spenser in his "Faerie Queene." It consists of a strophe of eight decasyllabic lines and an Alexandrine, with three rimés, the first and third line forming one, the second, fourth, fifth, and seventh another, and the sixth, eighth, and ninth the third. It is the statelst of English measures, and is used by Thomson in his "Castle of Indolence," by Byron in his "Childe Harold," etc.

II. n. The poetical measure of Spenser's "Faerie Queene"; a Spenserian verse or stanza.

O. W. Holmes, Poetry.

spent (spen't), p. a. [Pp. of spend<sup>1</sup>, v.] 1. Nearly or quite exhausted or worn out; having lost force or vitality; inefficient; impotent: generally in a comparative sense. A spent deer or other animal is one that has been chased or wounded nearly to death. A spent ball is a flying ball (from a gun) that has so nearly lost its impulse as to be unable to penetrate an object struck by it, though it may occasionally inflict a dangerous confused wound. A spent bill of lading or other commercial document is one that has fulfilled its purpose and should be canceled.

The forme of his style there, compared with Tullies writyng, is but even the talke of a spent old man.
Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 152.

Mine eyes, like spent lamps glowing out, grow heavy.
Fletcher, Sea Voyage, iii. 1.

2. Exhausted by spending or spawning; of fish, having spawned.

speos (spē'os), n. [< Gr. σπῆος, a cave.] In Egypt. archaeol., a temple or part of a temple, or a tomb of some architectural importance, as distinguished from a mere tunnel or syringe, excavated in the solid rock; a grotto-temple or tomb, as at Beni-Hassan (see out under hypogeum) and Abou Simbel (Ipsamboul). The larger speos of Abou Simbel is about 100 feet deep, and has all the parts of a complete open-air Egyptian temple.

Speotyto (spē-ot'i-tō), n. [NL. (Gloger, 1842), < Gr. σπῆος, a cave, + τύτο, the night-owl.] An American genus of Strigidae, containing several species of small long-legged earless owls which live in treeless regions and burrow in the ground, as S. cucularia of the pampas of South America and S. hypogaea of the prairies of western North America; the burrowing owls. A variety of the latter also inhabits Florida, and the genus is likewise represented in the West Indies. S. hypogaea is the species which is found in association with prairie-dogs and spermophiles, giving rise to many exaggerated accounts of the relation between the bird and the mammal. These owls were formerly placed in the genus Athene, and were also called Pholeopitryn. See cuts under owl.

spert, v. t. A variant of sparl.

sperable<sup>1</sup> (spē'ra-bl), a. [< L. sperabilis, that may be hoped for, < sperare, hope, < spes, hope.] Capable of being hoped for; affording grounds of hope.

Wherin, suerly perceaving his own cause not sperable, he doth honorably and wisely.
Sir W. Cecil (June 8, 1565), in Ellis's Hist. Letters, 2d ser., [clxxii].

speraget, n. Same as sparage.

speratet (spē'rät), a. [< L. speratus, pp. of sperare, hope.] Hoped for; not hopeless: opposed to desperate. In old law, in determining whether debts to a testator, the right to collect which devolved upon the executor, were assets to be accounted for by him, though not collected, regard had to be had to their character, whether they were sperate or desperate.

Spergula (spér-gū-lā), n. [NL. (Dillenius, 1719), named from its scattering its seeds; < L. spargere, scatter: see sparge.] A genus of petalous plants, of the order Caryophyllaceæ and tribe Alsineæ. It is characterized by the presence of small scarious stipules, by flowers with five styles alternate with the five sepals, and by a one-celled capsule with its five valves opposite the sepals. There are 2 or 3 species, widely scattered through temperate regions of either hemisphere, and especially abundant in fields and cultivated places of the Old World. They are annual herbs with dichotomous or clustered branches, the swollen and succulent axils bearing apparent whorls of awl-shaped leaves. The small white or pink flowers form raceme-like cymes with conspicuous pedicels. The species are known by the general name of spurry, sometimes sandweed.

Spergularia (spér-gū-lā-ri-ā), n. [NL. (Persoon, 1805), < Spergula + -aria.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Caryophyllaceæ and tribe Alsineæ. It is distinguished from the allied genus Spergula by its three styles and three-valved capsule, and differs from Arenaria, to which it was formerly referred, in the possession of stipules. There are 3 or 4 species, scattered through temperate regions, especially along salt-marshes and shores. They are commonly diffuse herbs, small and often succulent, with thread-like or linear leaves, often, as in Spergula, with secondary clusters of leaves forming apparent whorls at the axils. The small flowers open in bright sunshine, and are white or rose-colored or commonly purplish. The species are known as sand-spurry. At least 3 species are found on the Atlantic coast of the United States. See Tsisa.

sperhawk, n. Same as sparhawk for sparrowhawk.

spirket (spér'kot), n. [Also spirket; origin obscure.] A large hooked wooden peg, not much curved, to bang saddles, harness, etc., on. Hal-livell. [Prov. Eng.]

High on the spirket there it hung.
Bloomfield, Tho Horkey. (Davies.)

sperling (spér'ling), n. Same as spurling<sup>1</sup>.

sperm<sup>1</sup> (spér'm), n. [From MB. sperme, < OF. sperme, sperme, F. sperme = Sp. Pg. esperma = It. sperma, < L. sperma, < Gr. σπέρμα (sperma), seed, < σπείρειν, sow. Cf. spore<sup>2</sup>.] The male seed of any kind, as the semen or seminal fluid of the higher vertebrates, the male spawn or milt of the lower vertebrates, or the seminal elements of any animal, containing the male germs, or spermatozoa.

sperm<sup>2</sup> (spér'm), n. [Abbr. of spermaceti.] 1. Same as spermaceti.—2. A sperm-whale.—3. Sperm-oil.

sperma (spér'mi), n. Same as semen (which see).

spermaceti (spér-ma-sot'i or -sē'ti), n. and a. [Formerly or dial. also, in corrupt forms, parmaceti, parmacety, parmacetty, parmacity, parmacitty, etc.; < F. spermaceti = Sp. espermaceti = It. spermaceti, lit. 'whale's seed', the substance having been regarded as the spawn of the whale; < L. sperma, seed, + ceti, gen. of cetus, < Gr. κῆτος, whale: see Cetus.] 1. n. A peculiar fatty substance contained in the characteristic adipose tissue of the cavity of the head of the sperm-whale or cachalot, Physeter or Catodon macrocephalus, and related cetaceans. During the life of the animal the spermaceti is in a fluid state, and when the head is opened has the appearance of an oily white liquid. On exposure to the air the spermaceti concretes and precipitates from the oil, from which it may then be separated. After being purified by an elaborate process the spermaceti concretes into a white, crystallized, brittle, semi-transparent unctuous substance, nearly inodorous and insipid. It dissolves in boiling alcohol, and as the solution cools it is deposited in perfectly pure lamellated crystals. In this state it is called cetina. Spermaceti is a mixture of various fatty acids and derivatives of the acids. It is bland and demulcent, but in medicine it is chiefly employed externally as an ingredient in ointments, cerates, and cosmetics. It has also been largely used in the manufacture of candles.

By this fallacy of Æquivocation are they deluded who conceive spermaceti Isperma Ceti, Yscaud. Ep., 1646, which is found about the head, to be the spawn of the whale.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., II. 1.

II. a. 1. Pertaining to, derived from, or composed of spermaceti or sperm.—2. Producing or yielding spermaceti, as the sperm-whales.—Spermaceti ointment. See ointment.

spermaceti-oil (spér-ma-sot'i-oil), n. Sperm-oil.

spermaceti-whale (spér-ma-sot'i-hwāl), n. A sperm-whale.

Spermaceae (spér-ma-kō'sē), n. [NL. (Dillenius, 1732), so called in allusion to the carpels pointed with one or more calyx-teeth; < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, germ, + ἀκμή, a point, < ἀκνέω, n point, anything sharp.] A genus of rubiaceous plants, type of the tribe Spermacaceae. It is characterized by flowers with from two to four calyx-lobes sometimes with smaller teeth between, a small two-lobed or capitate stigma, and a dry fruit of two carpels which separate when ripe and are each or only one of them open, one often retaining the membranous axis. There are about 175 species, scattered through tropical and subtropical regions, and particularly common in America. They are annual or perennial herbs or low undershrubs, with smooth, rough, or hairy stems, commonly with four-angled branchlets. They bear opposite leaves, which are either sessile or petioled, membranous or coriaceous, nerved or feather-veined. The stipules are united with the petioles into a bristle-bearing membrane or sheath. The small sessile flowers are solitary in the axils or variously clustered, often in dense axillary and terminal heads, and are white, pink, or blue. In allusion to the heads, the species are called button-weed. Five species occur in the United States all southern and summer-flowering and with a short white corolla; S. glabra, the most common, extends into Ohio. Several species are in repute for medicinal properties, especially as substitutes for ipecacuanha, for which S. ferruginea and S. poeyi are used in Brazil, and S. verticillata in the West Indies. The root of S. hispida is used as a scurvy cure in India.

Spermaceae (spér-ma-kō'sē-ō), n. pl. [NL. (Chamisso and Schlechtendal, 1828), < Spermacoe + -ae (shortened for Spermacocceae).] A tribe of rubiaceous plants, of which Spermacoe is the type, embracing 18 other genera, chiefly natives of tropical or subtropical America.

sperma-duct (spér'ma-duk't), n. [NL. sperma-ductus, irreg. < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + L. ductus, a duct: see duct.] A spermatid duct, or spermatid duct; a male gonaduct or seminal passage; a hollow tubular or vesicular organ in the male, serving to convey or detain sperm or semen. It is connected in some way with the spermary, from which it carries off the sperm, and in many animals is specifically called the vas deferens. But it is a more comprehensive term, including the whole of the male generative passages, of whatever kind. Also sperma-ductus, spermiduct.

spermagone (spér'ma-gōn), n. Same as spermogone.

spermagonium (spér'ma-gō'ni-um), n. Same as spermogonium.

spermangium (spér-man'ji-um), n.; pl. spermangia (-i). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, sperm, + ἀγγεῖον, vessel.] In Algae, a receptacle containing the spores: same as conceptacle, 2 (b).

spermaphyte (spér'ma-fit), n. See spermophyte.

spermarium (spér-ma'ri-um), n.; pl. spermaria (-i). [NL., < L. sperma, seed, + -arium.] A spermary: used in distinction from ovarium.

spermary (spér'ma-ri), n.; pl. spermaries (-ri). [NL. spermarium.] The male gonaduct or essential sexual organ, of whatever character; the sperm-gland, or spermatid organ, or seminal gonad, in which spermatozoa are generated, in its specialized condition in the higher animals known as the testis or testicle. The term is used in distinction from ovary, both spermaries and ovaries being gonads. Also spermarium.

spermaphraxis (spér'ma-tom-frak'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα (sperma), seed, + φράξις, obstruction: see emphraxis.] Obstruction to the discharge of semen.

spermatheca (spér-ma-thō'kē), n.; pl. spermathecae (-sē). [NL., irreg. < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + θήκη, a case. Cf. spermatheca.] A spermatid case, capsule, or sheath; a receptacle for semen; specifically, the seminal receptacle in the female, as of various insects and other invertebrates, which receives and conveys or detains the sperm of the male. More correctly spermatheca. See also under Dendrocaula, ovari-ole, and Rhabdocela.

spermathecal (spér-ma-thō'kal), a. [From spermatheca + -al.] Of or pertaining to a spermatheca: as, a spermathecal duct or vesicle.

On reaching the point where the spermathecal duct debouches, they [ova] are impregnated by the spermatozoa which escape now from the spermatheca and meet the ova.
Encyc. Brit., XVI. 653.

spermatia, n. Plural of spermatozoon.

spermatic (spér-mat'ik), a. [From OF. (and F.) spermaticus = Sp. espermaticus = Pg. espermaticus = It. spermatico, < L. spermaticus, < Gr. σπέρματικός, < σπέρμα, seed: see sperm<sup>1</sup>.] 1. Of or pertaining to sperm, or male seed, in general; containing spermatozoa, or consisting of sperm or semen; seminal: as, spermatic fluid.—2. Secreting spermatozoa; generating or producing semen; seminal, as a spermatic gland.—3. Connected with or related to the spermary, or essential male organ; subservient to the male function; testicular: as, spermatic vessels; the spermatic cord.—4. In bot., resembling or of the nature of spermatia: as, spermatic filaments; spermatic gelatin.—5. Figuratively, seminal; germinal; fructifying. [Rare.]

I find certain books vital and spermatic, not leaving the reader what he was; he shuts the book a richer man.
Emerson, Books.

External spermatid fascia. Same as intercolumnar fascia (which see, under fascia).—External spermatid nerve. The genital branch of the genitocrural nerve. It supplies the cremaster muscle.—Internal spermatid fascia. Same as fundiform (form) fascia (which see, under fascia).—Spermatid artery. Any artery supplying a testis or other spermary, corresponding to an ovarian artery of the female. In man the spermatid arteries are two long slender arteries arising from the abdominal aorta a little below the renal arteries, and passing along each spermatid cord, to be distributed to the testes.—Spermatid calyx. A concretion sometimes found in the seminal vesicles.—Spermatid canal. (a) The inguinal canal. (b) Any spermatid duct, as the vas deferens.—Spermatid cord. Same as spermatidophore.—Spermatid cord. See cord.—Spermatid cyst. In pathol., a cyst arising in the testicle near the epididymis, and filled with fluid in which are often found spermatozoa, crystals, etc. See spermatocyst.—Spermatid duct. Same as sperma-duct.—Spermatid filament. A spermatozoon.—Spermatid gelatin. In bot., a gelatinous substance in spermogonia which when wet aids in the expulsion of the spermatia.—Spermatid logos. See logos.—Spermatid plexus of nerves. See plexus.—Spermatid plexus of veins. A thick plexus of convoluted vessels formed in the spermatid cord by the venous coarctations of the spermatid arteries. These veins coalesce after leaving the inguinal canal, and empty into the vena cava inferior of the right side and the renal vein of the left side. This venous plexus corresponds to the ovarian venous plexus of the female, and is specifically known as the pampiniform plexus. When varicose, it constitutes a varicocele or cirsocoele, an extremely common affection, most frequent on the left side.—Spermatid rete. Same as rete vasculosum testis (which see, under rete).—Spermatid sac. A sac containing a number of spermatozoa packed or bundled together, to be discharged on rupture of the sac.

spermatid (spér-mat'i-ka), a. [From spermatid + -al.] Same as spermatid. Bacon.

spermatidogenous (spér-ma-shi-ōj'e-nus), a. [From NL. spermatio + Gr. -γενής, producing: see -genous.] In bot., producing or bearing spermatia: as, a spermatidogenous surface.

On the contrary, they are disk-shaped or cushion-shaped bodies with the spermatidogenous surface folded into deep sinuous depressions. De Bary, Fungi (trans.), p. 241.

spermatidophore (spér-ma-shi-ō-fōr), n. [From NL. spermatio + Gr. -φόρος, < φέρω = E. bear<sup>1</sup>.] In bot., a structure bearing a spermatid.

spermatism (spér'ma-tizm), n. [From spermatid (ize) + -ism.] 1. Emission of semen; a seminal discharge.—2. Same as spermism.

spermatist (spér'ma-tist), n. [From σπέρμα (sperma), seed, + -ist.] Same as spermist.

spermatium (spér-ma'sbi-um), n.; pl. spermatia (-i). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed.] In bot., an exceedingly minute cylindrical or rod-shaped body in fungi, produced like spores in cup-like organs called spermatogonia. The spermatia are conjectured to be the male fertilizing organs, although the male sexual function of all spermatia in fungi has not been demonstrated. In more technical language a spermatium is a "male non-motile gamete conjugating with the trichogyne of a procarp" (Goebel).

spermatize (spér'ma-tiz), v. i.; pret. and pp. spermatized, ppr. spermatizing. [From Gr. σπέρματιζω, sow, yield seed, < σπέρμα, seed: see sperm<sup>1</sup>.] To yield male sperm or seed; have a seminal emission; discharge semen.

spermatoid, n. Plural of spermatoid. Owen. spermatoid (spér-ma-tō'id), a. [From spermatoid (ōn) + -al.] Pertaining to a spermatoid. Owen.

spermatoblast (spér'ma-tō-blást), n. [From σπέρμα (sperma), seed, + βλαστός, bud, sprout, shoot.] The bud or germ of a spermatozoon; a germinal blastema whence spermatozoa are produced. Spermatoblasts form a layer of avelated and avelated cells in the seminal tubules, which proliferates or projects into the lumen of the tubule with often a lobed or digitate end; and from every lobe a spermatozoon develops and is discharged, leaving a branching stump of the spermatoblast. Also spermatoblast, nematoblast.

spermatoblastic (spér'ma-tō-blás'tik), a. [From spermatoblast + -ic.] Of or pertaining to spermatoblasts or the formation of spermatozoa; germinal or budding, as a structure which develops spermatozoa. Also spermatoblastic.

spermatocoele (spér'ma-tō-sēl), n. [From σπέρμα (sperma), seed, + κύστης, a tumor.] A retention-cyst of the epididymis or testicle containing spermatozoa.

spermatocyst (spér'ma-tō-sist), n. [From NL. spermatocystis, < σπέρμα (sperma), seed, + κύστης, bladder: see cyst.] 1. In anat., a seminal vesicle.—2. In pathol., a spermatid cyst or sac. See spermatid.

spermatocystic (spér'ma-tō-sis'tik), a. [From spermatocyst + -ic.] Containing spermatozoa, as a cyst; of the nature of a spermatocyst.

spermatocystidium (spér'ma-tō-sis-tid'i-um), n.; pl. spermatocystidia (-i). [NL., < σπέρμα (sperma), seed, + κύστης, bladder, + dim. -idium.] In bot., same as antheridium. Hedwig.

spermatocystitis (spér'ma-tō-sis'tis), n. [NL.: see spermatocyst.] Same as spermatocystitis.

spermatocystitis (spér'ma-tō-sis'tis), n. [NL., < spermatocystis + -itis.] Inflammation of the seminal vesicles.

spermatocyte (spér'ma-tō-si'tal), a. [From spermatocyte + -al.] Of or pertaining to spermatocytes; of the nature of a spermatocyte.

spermatocyte (spér'ma-tō-sit), n. [From NL. spermatio + Gr. -κύτης, a hollow: see cyst.] 1. In bot., the mother-cell of a spermatozoid.

The protoplasm in each of the two cells of the antheridium (in Salvinia) contracts and by repeated bipartition divides into four roundish primordial cells (spermatocytes), each of which produces a spermatozoid.

Goebel, Special Morphology of Plants (trans.), p. 230.

2. The cell whose nuclear chromatin and cell-protoplasm become respectively the head and tail of the spermatozoon: synonymous with spermatoblast. Flemming.

These spermatocytes may either all develop into spermatozoa (Amphibians), or a single spermatocyte may become modified as a basilar cell (Pisglostome Fishes), or a number may form an envelope or cyst around the others (Amphibians and Fishes). Encyc. Brit., XX. 412.

spermatogemma (spér'ma-tō-jem'ma), n.; pl. spermatogemmae (-ō). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα (sperma), seed, + γemma, a bud.] A mass of spermatocytes; a multinuclear spermatid cyst; a kind of spermatoblast. See also spermosphere. Encyc. Brit., XX, 412.

spermatogenesis (spér'ma-tō-jen'e-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + γένεσις, origin.] In biol., the formation or development of spermatozoa. Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 301.

spermatogenetic (spér'ma-tō-jē-net'ik), a. [spermatogenesis, after genetic.] Of or pertaining to spermatogenesis; exhibiting or characterized by spermatogenesis: as, a spermatogenetic process or result; a spermatogenetic theory. Encyc. Brit., XX, 412.

spermatogenous (spér'ma-toj'e-nus), a. [Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + γένεσις, producing: see -genous.] Producing spermatozoa.

spermatogeny (spér'ma-toj'e-ni), n. [Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + γένεσις, -γενής, producing: see -geny.] The generation or production of spermatozoa; spermatogenesis.

spermatogonium (spér'ma-tō-gō-ni-um), n.; pl. spermatogonia (-i). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + γονή, generation.] 1. In bot., same as pyrenidium, 1.—2. A primitive or formative seminal cell, forming a kind of sperm-morula, or spermosphere composed of spermatoblasts or spermatocytes, which in turn give rise to spermatozooids. La Valette St. George.

spermatoid (spér'ma-toid), a. [Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + εἶδος, form.] Resembling sperm, or male seed; sperm-like; of the nature of sperm; spermatie or seminal.

spermatological (spér'ma-tō-lej'i-kal), a. [spermatology + -ical.] Of or pertaining to spermatology. Also spermatological.

spermatologist (spér'ma-tō-lō-jist), n. [spermatology + -ist.] One who is versed in spermatology. Also spermatologist.

spermatology (spér'ma-tō-lō-jī), n. [Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] The doctrine or body of facts and opinions regarding sperm, semen, or the male elements of procreation, as these of spermatogenesis or spermatogeny. Also spermatology.

spermatomere (spér'ma-tō-mēr), n. [Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + μέρος, part.] One of the parts into which the male or female pronucleus of an ovum may divide after fertilization.

Two of these "residual globules" are, according to them, expelled by the spermatomeres during their nuclear metamorphosis preceding division.

Micros. Science, XXVI, 597.

spermatooñt (spér'ma-tō-on), n.; pl. spermatooñts (-i). [Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + φόν, an egg.] The nucleus of a sperm-cell or spermatozoon; a cell which stands in the relation of such a nucleus, as that out of or from which a spermatozoon may be developed; a spermatoblast.

spermatophilus (spér'ma-tōf'i-lus), n. [NL. (Wagler, 1830), emended from Spermophilus.] Same as Spermophilus.

spermatophoral (spér'ma-tōf'ō-ral), a. [spermatophore + -al.] Of the character of or pertaining to a spermatophore. Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 291.

spermatophore (spér'ma-tō-fōr), n. [Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + φέρω = E. bear.] A special case, capsule, or sheath containing spermatozoa; specifically, one of the peculiar spermatie cysts of cephalopods (also called spermatie or seminal cartridge, seminal rope, or filament of Needham), usually forming a long cylindrical structure in which several envelopes may be distinguished. The contents of such a spermatophore are not exclusively seminal, for in the hinder part of each there is a special substance, the exploding mass, which serves to discharge the packet of spermatozoa. These are invested in a special tubular tunic, and packed in the front part of the spermatophore, like a charge of shot in a cartridge in front of the powder. Behind this packet of sperm the exploding mass forms a spiral coil, which extends through the greater part of the spermatophore and is continuous behind with the coat of the latter. When the spermatophore is wetted it swells up and bursts, through the force of the spring coiled inside, and the spermatozoa are discharged with considerable force. A spermatophore thus offers a striking analogy to the nematophore or thread-cell of a coelenterate, though the object attained is not urticulation or netting, but a seminal emission and consequent impregnation of the female. A spermatophore of some sort, less complex than that of cephalopods, is very commonly found in several classes of invertebrates.

spermatophorous (spér'ma-tōf'ō-rus), a. [As spermatophore + -ous.] Bearing or conveying seed, sperm, or spermatozoa; spermatogenous; seminiferous; specifically, bearing sperm as a spermatophore; of or pertaining to a spermatophore; spermatophoral.

spermatorrhæa, spermatorrhœa (spér'ma-tō-rē-ā), n. [NL. spermatorrhœa; < Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + ρέω, flow, run.] Involuntary seminal loss.

spermatospore (spér'ma-tō-spōr), n. [Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + σπόρος, a sowing.] A kind of cell which gives rise to spermatozoa. Also spermatospore.

spermatotheca (spér'ma-tō-thē-kā), n. Same as spermatheca.

spermatovum (spér'ma-tō-vum), n.; pl. spermatova (-vū) [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + L. ovum, egg.] A fecundated egg; an ovum after impregnation by spermatozoa, whence its substance consists of material from both parents. Also spermatovum.

Spermatozoa (spér'ma-tō-zō-ā), n. pl. [NL., pl. of spermatozoon, q. v.] 1. A supposed class or other group of animalcules; sperm-animal: so called before their nature was known, when they were regarded as independent parasitic organisms.—2. [i. e.] Plural of spermatozoon.

spermatozoal (spér'ma-tō-zō-āl), a. [spermatozoon + -al.] Same as spermatozoan.

spermatozoan (spér'ma-tō-zō-an), a. and n. [spermatozoon + -an.] 1. a. Of the nature of a spermatozoon; of or pertaining to spermatozoa. 2. n. A spermatozoon or spermatozoid.

spermatozoic (spér'ma-tō-zō-ik), a. [spermatozoon + -ic.] Same as spermatozoan.

spermatozoid (spér'ma-tō-zō-id), a. and n. [spermatozoon + -id.] See spermatozoid.

spermatozoidal (spér'ma-tō-zō-i-dal), a. [spermatozoon + -oid + -al.] Same as spermatozoid. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 443.

spermatozoid (spér'ma-tō-zō-oid), a. and n. [spermatozoon + -oid.] 1. a. Resembling a spermatozoon; of spermatozoan nature or appearance. 2. n. 1. A spermatozoon. Von Siebold. Also, less commonly, spermatozoid. See zoid.—2. In bot., a male ciliated motile gamete produced in an antheridium: same as antherozoid. In this sense more commonly spermatozoid. See also cut under antheridium.

spermatozoön (spér'ma-tō-zō-on), n.; pl. spermatozoa (-i). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + ζῶν, an animal.] 1. One of the numberless microscopic bodies contained in semen, to which the seminal fluid owes its vitality, and which are the immediate and active means of impregnating or fertilizing the ovum of the female; a spermatie cell or filament; a spermatozoon or spermatozoid. Spermatozoa are the vital and essential product of a spermary, male gonad, or testis, as ova are of the ovary or female gonad; their production, or the ability to produce them, is the characteristic distinction of the male from the female organism, whatever their size or shape or other physical character, and however various may be the organ in which they are produced. Spermatozoa, like ova, have the morphological value of the cell; and a spermatozoon is usually a cell in which a cell-wall, cell-contents, and cell-nucleus, with or without a nucleolus, may be distinguished. The form may be spherical, like the ovum, and indistinguishable therefrom by any physical character; more frequently, and especially in the higher animals, these little bodies are shaped like a tadpole, with a small spherical or discoidal head, a succeeding rod-like or bacillar part, and a long slender tail or caudal filament, capable of spontaneous vibratile movements, by means of which the spermatozoa swim actively in the seminal fluid, like a shoal of microscopic fishes, every one seeking, in the passages of the female into which the fluid has been injected, to discover the ovum in which to bury itself, in order to undergo dissolution in the substance of the ovum. They are smaller than the corresponding ovum, and several or many of them may be embedded in one ovum. The actual union of spermatozoa with an ovum, and fusion of their respective protoplasts, is required for impregnation, and is the consummation of sexual intercourse, to which all other acts and processes are simply ancillary or subservient. Spermatozoa may be killed by cold, or chemical or mechanical injury, like any other cells. These bodies, very similar to various animalcules, were discovered and named spermatozoa by Leeuwenhoek in 1677; they were at first and long afterward regarded as independent organisms, variously classed as parasitic helminths or infusorians—such a view being held, for instance, by Von Baer so late as 1827 or 1835. Von Siebold, who found them in various vertebrates, called them spermatozooids. Their true nature appears to have been first recognized by Kölliker. Spermatozoa or their equivalents are diagnostic of the male sex under whatever conditions they exist, whether in male individuals separate from the female, or in those many hermaphrodite animals which unite the two sexes in one individual; and the organ which produces them is invariably a testis or its equivalent spermary, of whatever character. The male elements of the lowest animals, however, as Protozoa, do not ordinarily receive the name spermatozoa, this being specially applied to the more elaborate male cells of the character above described. The origination of spermatozoa has of late years been the subject of much research and discussion; the details of the process, as observed in different animals, or under different conditions of investigation, together with conflicting doctrinal conclusions, have occasioned a large special vocabulary. See many words preceding and following this one.

Spermatozooids of Adiantum Capillus-Veneris.

2. [cap.] A genus of animalcules. Von Baer, 1827.

sperm-ball (spér'm-bāl), n. A spherical cluster of spermatozoa, such as occurs in some sponges. Encyc. Brit., XXII, 424.

sperm-blastoderm (spér'm-blas'tō-děrm), n. A blastodermic layer of formative spermatozoa composing the surface of a sperm-blastula.

sperm-blastula (spér'm-blas'tū-lā), n. A spermatie blastula, or hollow sphere whose surface is a layer of formative spermatozoa.

sperm-cell (spér'm-sel), n. 1. A spermatozoon: so called from its morphological valence as a cell.—2. A cell giving rise to spermatozoa; a spermatoblast or spermatocyte.

spermet, n. An obsolete spelling of sperm 1.

Spermestes (spér-mes'tēz), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1837), said to be (irreg.) < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + εἶσεν, eat.] The typical genus of Spermestinae, containing six or eight species confined to Africa and Madagascar. Such are S. cucullata, S. poensis, and S. bicolor, of the continent, and the Madagascar S. nana. These little birds are closely related to Ammidina, of which Spermestes is often rated as a subgenus.

Spermestinae (spér-mes-tī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Spermestes + -inae.] An extensive subfamily of Ploceidae, named from the genus Spermestes. The very numerous species, about 150, are chiefly African and Asiatic, but some of them extend to Australia and various Polynesian islands. Among them are the amadavats and estrilds. Leading genera are Lagonosticta, Spermospiza, Pyrenestes, Estrilda, and Amadina. See cut under senegal.

spermestine (spér-mes'tin), a. Of, or having characters of, the Spermestinae.

spermic (spér'mik), a. [sperm 1 + -ic.] Same as spermatie.

spermidium (spér-mid'i-um), n.; pl. spermidia (-i). [NL., < L. sperma, seed, germ, + -idium.] In bot., same as acellum, 1.

spermiduct (spér'mi-duct), n. [L. sperma, sperm, + ductus, a duct: see duct. Cf. spermaduct.] A passage for the conveyance of sperm in the female of Echinorhynchus. See the quotation. [Rare.]

From the lower end of the ovary [of the female of Echinorhynchus] two short oviducts, or rather spermiducts, arise, and almost immediately unite into a sort of uterus, which is continued into the vagina. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 555.

spermin (spér'min), n. [sperm 1 + -in.] A non-poisonous alkaloid (C<sub>2</sub>H<sub>5</sub>N) obtained from sputum, human semen, organs of leucemic patients, and alcoholic anatomical preparations.

spermism (spér'mizm), n. [sperm 1 + -ism.] The theory or doctrine that the male sperm contains the whole germ of the future animal, which develops entirely from a spermatozoon, the ovum serving merely as a mold or matrix; animalculism. Also spermatism.

spermist (spér'mist), n. [sperm 1 + -ist.] One who holds the theory of spermism or spermatism; an animalculist: the opposite of ovulist. See theory of incasement, under incasement. Also spermatist.

sperm-kernel (spér'm-kér'nel), n. Same as spermocoeus.

sperm-morula (spér'mor'fō-lī), n. A spermatocyst; a mulberry-mass of formative spermatozoa.

sperm-nucleus (spér'm-nū'klē-us), n. 1. The nucleus of a spermatozoon; a spermococcus or sperm-kernel. —2. In bot., the nucleus of a male gamete, which coalesces with the nucleus of an oöspere to form a germ-nucleus. Goebel.

spermoblast (spér'mō-blást), n. Same as spermoblast.

spermoblastic (spér-mō-blás'tik), a. Same as spermoblastic.

spermocarp (spér'mō-kärp), n. [Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + καρπός, fruit.] In bot., the so-called "fruit" in the Characeae and certain confervoid algae. It is the fertilized and matured female organ with its variously formed covering or pericarp and accessory cells. The "fruit" of the Characeae has also been called the antheridium, sporogonium, enveloped oogonium, and sporophyllum, by different authors. Sporophyllum seems the preferable term. See these various words. Compare sporocarp. See cuts under antheridium and conceptacle.

spermococcus (spér'mō-kōk'us), n.; pl. spermococci (-sī). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + κόκκος, grain, berry.] The nucleus of a spermatozoon: it consists of the head of the sperm-animalcule, excepting its thin outer layer. Also sperm-kernel.

spermoderm (spér'mō-dèrm), n. [Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + δέρμα, skin.] In bot., the integument of a seed in the aggregate; properly, same as testa.

spermogastrula (spér'mō-gas'trō-lī), n.; pl. spermogastrulae (-lī). [NL., < L. sperma (see sperm<sup>1</sup>) + NL. gastrula, q. v.] A sperm-blastula which has undergone a kind of gastrulation.

spermogone (spér'mō-gōn), n. [NL. spermogonium.] In bot., same as spermogonium; also employed by some writers to denote the spermatorium or spore-like body which is produced in a spermogonium. See spermogonium, spermatorium. Also spelled spermagone.

spermogonia, n. Plural of spermogonium.

spermogoniferous (spér'mō-gō-nif'ō-rus), a. [< NL. spermogonium, q. v., + L. ferre = E. bear.] In bot., bearing or producing spermogonia.

spermogonium (spér'mō-gō-ni-um), n.; pl. spermogonia (-ī). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + γόνος, producing; seo -gony.] In bot., a cup-shaped cavity or like a bullfinch's, giving name to the subfamily Spermophilinae. The limits of the genus vary with different authors, but it usually includes about 50 species, of tropical and subtropical America. The only one of these which occurs in the United States is S. moreletii, which is found in Texas, and known as Morelet's pygmy finch. It is only about 4 inches long, with extremely turrid bill convex in all its outlines, short rounded wings, and still shorter tail. The male is entirely black and white, the latter color tinged with buff on the under parts; the female is olivaceous-brown above and brownish-yellow or buff below, with whitish wing-bars. A like dissimilarity of coloration characterizes the sexes throughout the genus. By those who hold that Spermophila is the same name as Spermophilus, this genus is called Spermophila; and some or all of the species are often placed in a more extensive genus Gyrinorhynchus, of which Spermophila or Spermophilus then constitutes one section. See cut under grassquit. Also called Spermospiza.

2. In mammal., same as Spermophilus, 1. J. Richardson, 1825.—3. In entom., a genus of arachnids. Hentz, 1842.

spermophile (spér'mō-fil), n. [< NL. Spermophilus.] 1. A rodent quadruped of the genus Spermophilus, as a ground-squirrel or suslik, of which there are numerous species in Europe, Asia, and North America. See cuts under suslik and Spermophilus. —2. A fringilline bird of the genus Spermophila; a little seed-eater, of which there are numerous Central and South American species. See cut under grassquit.

Spermophilinae (spér'mō-fil-i-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Spermophilus (in sense 2) + Spermophila + -inae.]

1. In mammal., the ground-squirrels or spermophiles, prairie-dogs, and marmots, one of two subfamilies into which the Sciuridae are sometimes divided, represented by the genera Spermophilus, Tamias, and Arctomys. It is not separated from Sciurinae or the true arboreal squirrels by any transcending characters, and the two divisions intergrade through the genera Xerus and Tamias. But the spermophilines are of terrestrial habits, with usually stouter form, larger size, and less bushy tail than the Sciurinae. They inhabit Europe, Asia, and especially North America, where the greater number of species are found, and most of them are called gophers. The group is also called Arctomyiinae. See cuts under Arctomys, chipmunk, prairie-dog, Spermophilus, and suslik.

2. In ornith., an American subfamily of Fringillidae, named from the genus Spermophila. P. L. Selater, 1862.

spermophiline (spér'mō-fil-in), a. and n. [< Spermophilinae.] 1. a. Pertaining to the Spermophilinae, or having their characters.

II. n. A member of the Spermophilinae.

Spermophilus (spér'mō-fil-us), n. [NL. (F. Cuvier, 1822), < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + φιλέω, love.]

1. A genus of ground-squirrels, giving name to the Spermophilinae. The type is S. citellus of Europe, the suslik, but the genus is especially well represented in North America, where more than a dozen distinct species occur, some of which run into several varieties. They are divided into 3 subgenera: (1) Otospermophilus, in which the ears are high and pointed, the tail is full and broad, with the hairs from two thirds to three quarters of the length of the head and body, and the whole aspect is strongly squirrel-like. To this section belongs S. grammurus, with its varieties beecheyi and douglasi; these are the common ground-squirrels of California, Oregon, and Washington, and east to the Rocky Mountains. S. annulatus of Mexico probably also belongs here. (2) Callospermus, in which the ears are short and rudimentary, the tail is short, from one third to one half the length of the body, and the form is stout. The Old World species belong here, and several of those of North America, as Parry's spermophile, S. empetra (or parryi), which inhabits British America and Alaska, and runs into several varieties, as kodiacensis and erythrogaster. In the United States the best-known species of this section is Richardson's spermophile, S. richardsoni, very generally distributed, in one or another of its varieties, from the plains of the Saskatchewan to those of the Laramie. It is a tawny animal, resembling a prairie-dog in appearance and habits. Here also belong S. mollis, S. spilosoma, and S. obsoletus, inhabiting western parts of the United States. (3) Ictidomys, which includes several slender-bodied species, almost like weasels in this respect (whence the name), with the ears generally small or rudimentary, as in Callospermus, the skull long and narrow, the tail variable, and the first upper premolar generally small. The most squirrel-like of these is Franklin's spermophile, S. franklini, inhabiting Illinois and Missouri and northward to 64°. It not distinctly resembles a gray squirrel, the tail being bushy, two thirds as long as the head and body. The commonest species is S. tridecemlineatus, the thirteen-

Thirteen-lined Spermophile, or Federation Squirrel (Spermophilus tridecemlineatus). lined spermophile, or federation squirrel, so called by Dr. S. L. Mitchell (in 1821) from the original thirteen States of the United States, it having a number (six or eight) of longitudinal stripes, with five or seven rows of spots between them, likened by that patriot to the "stars and stripes." It inhabits the prairies of the United States at large, and extends northward into British America. Other species of this section are S. mexicanus of Texas and Mexico, and S. tereticaudus of Arizona and California. Three of the above animals, S. grammurus, S. franklini, and S. tridecemlineatus, are numerous enough in cultivated districts to be troublesome, and all of them are called gophers, a name shared by the different animals of the family Geomysidae. They are all terrestrial (S. franklini somewhat arboreal), and live in burrows underground, much like prairie-dogs, though none of them dig so extensively. In many parts of the Dakotas and Montana the ground is honeycombed with the burrows of S. richardsoni. They feed on herbage and seeds, and are also to some extent carnivorous. They are prolific, like most rodents, and bring forth their young in burrows. Those of northern regions hibernate like marmots. Their flesh is eatable. The name of the genus is also written Spermophila and Spermophilus, but both of these forms are rare. See also cut under suslik.

2. In entom., a genus of coleopterous insects. Gebler.

spermophore (spér'mō-fōr), n. [< NL. spermophorum.] Same as spermophorum.

spermophorum (spér'mō-fō-rum), n.; pl. spermophora (-rā). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + φέρω = E. bear.] 1. A seminal vesicle. —2. In bot., a synonym of placenta and also of funiculus.

Spermophyta (spér'mōf-i-tī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of spermophytum: see spermophyte.] The highest of the four principal groups or divisions into which the vegetable kingdom is separated by the later systematists. It embraces the higher or flowering plants, those producing true seeds. It is the same as Phanerogamia. The correlative terms in descending systematic order are Pteridophyta, Bryophyta, and Thallophyta. See Phanerogamia, and compare Cryptogamia.

spermophyte (spér'mō-fit), n. [< NL. spermophytum, < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + φυτόν, plant.] In bot., a member of the Spermophyta; a plant producing true seeds; a phænogam, or flowering plant. Sometimes written spermaphyte.

spermophytic (spér'mō-fit'ik), a. [< spermophyte + -ic.] In bot., capable of producing true seeds; phænogamic.

spermoplasm (spér'mō-plazm), n. [< Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + πλάσμα, anything formed or molded: see plasma.] The protoplasm of a spermatozoon; the plasmic contents of a spermule, distinguished from the spermococcus or sperm-kernel. Also spermoplasma.

spermopodium (spér'mō-pō'di-um), n.; pl. spermopodia (-ī). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + ποδ- (pod-) = E. foot.] In bot., an unused name for the gynophore in Umbelliferae.

spermosphere (spér'mō-sfēr), n. [< Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + σφαῖρα, sphere.] A mass of spermoblasts; a spermatogemma.

Spermospiza (spér'mō-spi'zī), n. [NL. (G. R. Gray, 1840), < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + σπίζα, a finch.] 1. A leading genus of Spermestinae, the type of which is the African S. hamatina. Originally called Spermophaga, a name too near Spermophagus. —2. A genus of American finches, synonymous with Spermophila. Bonaparte.

spermospore (spér'mō-spōr), n. Same as spermospore.

spermotheca (spér'mō-thē'kī), n.; pl. spermothecae (-sē). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + θήκη, a case. Cf. spermatheca.] In bot., a pericarp. [Rare.]

spermovarian (spér'mō-vā'ri-an), a. [< spermovarium + -an.] Of or pertaining to a spermovarium.

spermovarium (spér'mō-vā'ri-um), n.; pl. spermovaria (-ī). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + NL. ovarium, q. v.] A hermaphroditic genital gland; a bisexual gonad; an ovispermary or ovotestis, which gives rise, simultaneously or successively, to male and female products. See cut under ovotestis.

spermovary (spér'mō-vā'ri), n.; pl. spermovaries (-riz). [< NL. spermovarium.] Same as spermovarium.

spermovum (spér'mō-vum), n.; pl. spermova (-vā). [< Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + L. ovum, egg.] Same as spermatozoon.

sperm-rope (spér'm-rōp), n. A string of spermatozoa packed in a long case; a package of sperm, as one of the spermatic cartridges of a cephalopod. For description, see spermatophore. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 682.

spermule (spér'mül), n. [< NL. spermulum, dim. of LL. sperma, seed: see sperm<sup>1</sup>.] A seed-animalcule, sperm-cell, spermatozoon, or zoöspERMium; the fertilizing male element, of the morphological valence of a cell. Spermule is Haeckel's

Section of Barberry-leaf (of its natural thickness at a), infested with Puccinia graminis in its acedial stage.
sp, spermogonia; a, fruit, inclosed within the peridium p, or open and discharging spores. (Somewhat magnified.)

receptacle in which spermatia are produced. See spermatorium, peridium, Puccinia (with cut). Also spermogonium.

spermogonous (spér'mō-gō-nus), a. [< spermogone + -ous.] In bot., resembling or having the character of spermogonia or spermogones.

sperm-oil (spér'm-ōil), n. Spermaceti-oil; the oil of the spermaceti-whale. See train-oil.

spermolith (spér'mō-lith), n. [< Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + λίθος, stone.] A concretion which occasionally forms in the seminal ducts.

spermological (spér'mō-loj'i-kāl), a. Same as spermatological.

spermologist (spér'mō-lō-jist), n. [< spermologist + -ist.] 1. Same as spermatologist. —2. In bot., one who treats of or collects seeds; a student of or an authority in spermology.

spermology (spér'mō-lō-jī), n. 1. Same as spermatology. —2. In bot., that branch of science which investigates the seeds of plants.

spermonucleus (spér'mō-nū'klē-us), n.; pl. spermonuclei (-ī). [NL., < L. sperma (see sperm<sup>1</sup>) + nucleus, q. v.] A male pronucleus. See masculonucleus, feminonucleus. Hyatt.

Spermophila (spér'mōf-i-lī), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1827), < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + φιλέω, love.] 1. In ornith., the little seed-eaters or pygmy finches, an extensive genus of small American fringilline birds, with very short stout bills term, corresponding to ovule for the female egg-cell. The protoplasm of the spermule is called spermoplasm, and the nucleus spermococcus.

spermulum (spĕr'mū-lum), n.; pl. spermula (-lā). [NL.: see spermule.] A spermule, sperm-cell, or spermatozoon.

sperm-whale (spĕr'm'hwāl), n. [spĕr'm + whale]. The spermaceti-whale or cachalot, Physeter (or Catodon) macrocephalus, belonging to the family Physcteridae (which see for technical characters; see also out of skull under Physcter). It is one of the largest of animals, exceeded in length only by the great roquol or finner, Balenoptera subadati; it has teeth in the lower jaw, but none and no baleen in the upper; and the enormous square head contains the valuable product spermaceti. This whale is also the source of the best whale-oil, and its chase is a very important industry in the warmer waters of all seas. See cachalot.—Porpoise sperm-whale, a pygmy sperm-whale, or snub-nosed cachalot, of the family Physcteridae and genus Kogia, as K. brevicestris (K. fowleri of Gill), of the Pacific and chiefly tropical seas, but sometimes occurring off the coast of the United States.—Sperm-whale porpoise, a bottle-nosed whale of the genus Hyperoodon. It belongs to the same family (Physcteridae) as the sperm-whale, but to a different subfamily. (See Ziphiidae.) The species are several, not well determined, and with confused synonymy. They are larger than any porpoises properly so called, though far inferior in size to the true sperm-whale.

Sperm-whale (Physeter macrocephalus).

speron, n. [It. speronc = OF. esperon, F. épéron, a spur, the beak of a ship: see spur.] The beak of a ship.

Which barks are made after the manner of fusts or Gal. Hots, with a Speron and a covered poop.

Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 215.

sperri, v. t. Same as spari.

sperriable, n. An obsolete form of sparable.

speryllite (spĕr'i-lit), n. [Named after F. L. Sperry, the discoverer.] A native arsenide of platinum, occurring in minute isometric crystals with pyrite and chalcopyrite at the Vermilion mine, near Sudbury in Ontario. It has a tin-white color, brilliant metallic luster, and a specific gravity of 10.6. It is the only compound of platinum known to occur in nature.

sperset (spĕrs), v. t. and i. [An aphetic form of disperse, or var. of sparsc.] To disperse. Spenser, Visions of Bellay, l. 195.

sperthet, n. A Middle English form of sparth.

sperlet, v. and n. An obsolete form of spurtle.

sperveri, spervyout, n. Same as sparver.

spessartite, spessartine (spĕs'ār-tīt, -tīn), n.

[Spessart, a mountainous region in Germany, north of the river Main.] A manganesian variety of garnet.

spet, v. and n. An obsolete or dialectal variant of spit.

spetch (spech), n. [Assibilated form of speck.] A piece of skin or hide used in making glue: as, size made from buffalo-spetches.

spetoust, a. See spitous.

spew (spū), v. [Formerly also spue; < ME. spewen, spuen, spiveu, < AS. spīcan (pret. spāw, pp. spīwen) = OS. spīcan = OFries. spīa = MD. spījen, spouwen, spuunen, D. spuwen = OHG. spīcan, spīan, MHG. spīen, G. speien = Icel. spīja = Sw. Dan. spī = Goth. spīcan, spew, = L. spuere = Gr. σπῆν, Doric σπῆν (for **σπῆν*), spit, = OBulg. plivati, pljuti = Bohem. pliti = Pol. pluc = Russ. plivati = Lith. spīanti = Lett. spīant (Slav. pljū < spjū), spit. Hence ult. spit.] I. intrans. 1. To discharge the contents of the stomach; vomit; puke.

Then he gan to spue, and up he threwo
The balsame all againe.

Robin Hood and the Peddlers (Child's Ballads, V. 248).

2. In gun., to run at the mouth: said of a gun which bonds at the chase, or whose muzzle droops, from too quick firing.

II. trans. 1. To vomit; puke up or out; eject from or as if from the stomach.

So then because thou art lukewarm . . . I will spue thee out of my mouth.

2. To eject as if by retching or heaving; send or cast forth from within; drive by internal force or effort: often used figuratively.

That the land spue not you out also, when ye desire it, as it spued out the nations that were before you.

Lev. xviii. 28.

To live, for me, Jane, is to stand on a crater-crust which may crack and spew thro any day.

Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xx.

To spew oakum, said of the seams of a ship when the oakum starts out from between the planks.

spewer (spū'ēr), n. [spew + -er.] One who or that which spews.

spewiness (spū'ī-nes), n. The state of being spewy, moist, or damp.

The coldness and spewiness of the soil.

Bp. Gauden, Hieraspistes (1653), p. 551. (Latham.)

spewing (spū'ing), a. Same as spewy.

The soil [in New England] for the general is a warm kind of Earth, there being little cold spewing Land.

S. Clarke, Four Plantations in America (1670), p. 29.

[See also the quotation under emucation.]

spewy (spū'ī), a. [spew + -y.] Wet; boggy; moist; damp.

The lower valleys in wet winters are so spewy that they know not how to feed them.

Mortimer, Husbandry.

Speyside pine. See pine.

sp. gr. An abbreviation of specific gravity.

sphacel (sfas'el), n. [NL. sphacelus, q. v.]

Same as sphacelus.

sphacela (sfas'e-lī), n.; pl. sphaclae (-lē). [Gr. σφακέλος, gangrene.] In bot., in certain algae, a hollow chamber of considerable size which is developed from the apical cell of each branch. When young it is filled with dark mucilaginous contents, which at a later stage become watery. The term is sometimes used as nearly or quite the equivalent of propagulum. Also sphaclae.

Sphacelaria (sfas-e-lā'ri-ā), n. [NL., so called in allusion to the tips of the branches, which are black and shriveled when dried; < Gr. σφακέλος, gangrene.] A genus of algae, typical of the family Sphacelariaceae. They have olive-brown, branching, filamentous fronds, with corticating cells wanting or confined to the base of the frond. The axis and branches are terminated by a large apical cell, from which, by transverse, longitudinal, and oblique divisions, a solid frond is formed whose external surface is composed of rectangular cells arranged in regular transverse bands. The unilocular and plurilocular sporangia are spherical or ellipsoidal, borne on short pedicels; reproduction is non-sexual, by means of propagula. The species are variable, and difficult of determination. There are two species along the New England coast.

Sphacelariaceae (sfas-o-lā-ri-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphacelaria + -aceae.] A family of algae, typified by the genus Sphacelaria. They are olive-brown seaweeds with branching polysiphonous fronds, the branches of which terminate in a peculiar large apical cell. Also Sphacelariaceae.

sphacelate (sfas'e-lūt), a. [sphaclae + -ate.]

1. In pathol., dead; necrosed.—2. In bot., decayed, withered, or dead.

sphacelate (sfas'e-lūt), v.; pret. and pp. sphacelated, ppr. sphacelating. [sphaclae + -ate.]

I. intrans. To become necrosed.

II. trans. To affect with sphacelus or necrosis.

The floor of the existing wound was of course formed by sphacelated hepatic tissue.

Lancet, 1890, II. 425.

sphacelated (sfas'o-lā-ted), a. [sphacelate + -ed.] Same as sphacelate.

sphacelation (sfas-e-lā'shon), n. [sphacelate + -ion.] Necrosis; the process of becoming or making gangrenous; mortification.

sphacele (sfas'el), n. [NL. sphacela.] In bot., same as sphacela.

Sphaclia (sfā-sō'li-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. σφακέλος, gangrene.] A former genus of fungi, now known to be the conical stage or form of Claviceps, the ergot. It constitutes the first stage of the ergot, and consists of a growth of mycelium destroying and replacing the ovary of the host, taking approximately the form of the latter. It produces conical spores upon the tips of basidia which radiate from the surface of the hyphal mass. See ergot, 2. Also Sphaclium.

sphacelism (sfas'e-liz-m), n. [sphacel(us) + -ism.] Same as sphacclism.

sphacclism (sfas'e-lis'mus), n. [NL., < Gr. σφακκλίσμος, gangrene, < σφακκέλλειν, to be gangrened or blighted, < σφακέλος, gangrene: see sphacelus.] Necrosis.

Sphacelium (sfā-sō'li-um), n. [NL.: see Sphaclia.] Same as Sphaclia.

Sphaceloma (sfas-e-lō'mā), n. [NL., < Gr. σφακέλος, gangrene: see sphacellus.] A genus of pyronomycetous fungi, containing the very destructive species (S. Ampelinum) known as anthracnose. It first appears on the shoots, leaves, and berries of grape-vines as minute brown spots which are little depressed in the middle and have a slightly raised darker-colored rim. These spots soon increase in size and elongate longitudinally. On the fruit the spots retain a more or less regularly rounded outline, and have a well-defined band of bright vermilion between the dark border and the central portion. Finally, under the action of the disease, the berries dry up, leaving nothing, apparently, but the skin and seeds. Washing the vines with a strong solution of sulphate of iron before the appearance of the leaves has been found effective in destroying or checking the disease. See anthracnose.

sphacelus (sfas'e-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. σφακέλος, gangrene, mortification, earies, also a spasm, convulsion.] 1. Necrosis.—2. A necrosed mass of tissue.

Spharalcea (sfĕ-rāl'sē-ā), n. [NL. (St. Hilaire, 1824), so called from the fruit, a round head of carpels; < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + ἀλέα, a plant, Malva Alcea, related to the plant here defined.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Malvaceae, tribe Malveae, and subtribe Abutilineae. It is characterized by flowers each with three bractlets, and fruit of numerous two-valved carpels naked within, each containing two or three reniform seeds. There are about 25 species, natives of warmer parts of America, with 4 at the Cape of Good Hope. They are herbs or shrubs, in habit resembling the genus Malva. They usually bear angled or lobed leaves, and short-pediced violet or reddish flowers single or clustered in the axils or forming a raceme or spike. They are known as globe mallow, and several species are in cultivation for ornament under glass. They possess marked demulcent properties, especially S. cispaltina, a decoction of which is used as a remedy in Brazil, and as a substitute for marsh-mallows.

Sphæranthus (sfĕ-ran'thus), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1753), so called from the clustered heads of flowers; < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, + ἄνθος, flower.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Compositae, tribe Inuloidae, and subtribe Pluchineae. It is characterized by flowers without pappus, the central ones bisexual, fertile or sterile, tubular and four- to five-cleft, the outer female and fertile, filiform and minutely two- to three-toothed, and by the aggregation of the small flower-heads into a dense solitary terminal spherical or ovoid glomerule. There are about 10 species, natives of the tropics of Asia, Africa, and Australia. They are erect villous or glutinous herbs, with divaricate branches terminated by the pink flower-clusters. The leaves are alternate, toothed, and decurrent on the stem. S. hirtus is known as the East Indian globe-thistle; S. mollis is a common Indian weed of dry cultivated land, clothed everywhere with soft glandular hairs which give off a powerful honey-like odor.

sphæraphides (sfĕ-raf'i-dēz), n. pl. [Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, + φαῖς, a needle.] In bot., the more or less spherical masses of crystals or raphides occurring in the cells of many plants. Also called sphære-crystals.

sphæret, n. An obsolete form of sphere.

sphærenchyma (sfĕ-rĕng'ki-mī), n. [NL., irreg. < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, + ἔγχυμα, an infusion: see parenchyma.] Spherical or spheroidal cellular tissue, such as is found in the pulp of fruits: a modification of parenchyma. Treas. of Bot.

Sphæria (sfō'ri-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball: see sphere.] A genus of pyrenomycetous fungi, giving name to the family Sphæriaceae. The perithecia are black, carbonaceous or membranaceous, pitted at the apex, usually superficial or erumpent. The species are very numerous, among them being S. morbosa, the destructive black-knot of plum- and cherry-trees. See black-knot, 2.

Sphæriaceae (sfō-ri-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Fries, 1825), < Sphæria + -aceae.] A family of pyrenomycetous fungi, typified by the genus Sphæria.

Sphæriacei (sfō-ri-ā'sē-ī), n. pl. [NL., < Sphæria + -acei.] Same as Sphæriaceae.

sphæriaceous (sfō-ri-ā'shi-us), a. [Sphæria + -aceous.] In bot., resembling or belonging to the genus Sphæria or the Sphæriaceae.

sphæridia, n. Plural of sphæridium, 1.

sphæridial (sfĕ-rīd'i-āl), a. [sphæridium + -al.] Of or pertaining to the spheridia of a sea-urchin.

Sphæridiidae (sfō-ri-dī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphæridium + -idae.] The Sphæridiidae as a family of palpicorn coleopterous insects. Also Sphæridiidae, Sphæridida, Sphæridides, Sphæridites, Sphæridiota, Sphæridites.

Sphæridiinae (sfĕ-rīd-i-ī-nē), n. pl. [NL. (Le Conte, 1883, as Sphæridiini), < Sphæridium + -inae.] A subfamily of the water-beetle family Hydrophilidae, remarkable from the fact that its forms are all terrestrial. They are small, oval, convex, or hemispherical beetles which live in the excrement of herbivorous mammals. They are usually black in color, with the elytra frequently spotted or margined with yellow. They are divided into six genera, of which five are represented in the United States. See Sphæridium, 2.

sphæridium (sfĕ-rīd'i-um), n. [NL., < Gr. σφαῖρον, dim. of σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere; see sphere.] 1. Pl. sphæridia (-ā). In echinoderms, one of the numerous minute spheroidal bodies, rarely more than one hundredth of an inch long, which are found in nearly all sea-urchins upon the ambulacral plates, especially those nearest the mouth. Each contains a dense glassy calcareous skeleton, and is articulated by a short pedicel, like a spine, to one of the tubercles. The spheridia are supposed to be olfactory or auditory sense-organs.

In some genera, these sphæridia, to which Lovén ascribes a sensory function (probably auditory), are sunk in fossæ of the plate to which they are attached.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 490.

2. [cap.] [NL. (Fabricius, 1795).] The typical genus of the Sphæridiinae, comprising mainly African species distinguished by the elongate scutellum and the visible pygidium. S. scarabaeoides is an example.

Sphaeriidae (sfē-rī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphaerium + -idae.] A family of fresh-water bivalve mollusks, typified by the genus Sphaerium, formerly called Cycladidae, and now generally united with the typical Cyrenidae under the latter name.

sphaeristerium (sfē-ris-tō'ri-um), n.; pl. sphaeristeria (-ī). [L. sphaeristerium, < Gr. σφαίριον, a place for playing ball, < σφαίριον, play at ball, < σφαίρα, a ball: see sphere.] In class. antiq., any place or structure for the exercise of ball-playing; a tennis-court.

sphaerite (sfē'rit), n. [L. sphaerite, < Gr. σφαίρα, a ball, sphero, < -ite.] A hydrous phosphato of aluminium, allied to wavelite in structure and composition.

Sphaerium (sfē'ri-um), n. [NL. (Scopoli, 1777), < Gr. σφαίριον, dim. of σφαίρα, a ball.] The typical genus of the Sphaeriidae, or a genus of the family Cyrenidae, for a long time generally known as Cyclas. It contains many small clam-like fresh-water shells.

Sphaerobacteria (sfē'rō-bak-tē'ri-ī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σφαίρα, a sphere, < NL. bacterium, q. v.] In Cohn's system of classification, a tribe of schizomycetes or bacteria, with spherical cells, as in the genus Micrococcus. See Micrococcus.

Sphaerococcaceae (sfē'rō-ko-kā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphaerococcus + -aceae.] The same or nearly the same as the Sphaerococcoidae.

Sphaerococcoidae (sfē'rō-ko-koi'dō-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphaerococcus + -oidae.] An order or suborder of florideous algae, named from the genus Sphaerococcus. The fronds are cylindrical or membranaceous, often of very delicate substance. The antheridia form superficial patches, or are occasionally contained in sunken cavities.

Sphaerococcus (sfē'rō-ko-k'us), n. [NL. (Stackhouse, 1842), < Gr. σφαίρα, a ball, < κόκκος, a berry.] A genus of florideous algae, giving name to the order Sphaerococcoidae. There are no American species.

Sphaerodactylus (sfē'rō-dak'ti-lus), n. [NL. (Wagler, 1830), < Gr. σφαίρα, a ball, < δάκτυλος, finger.] A genus of American gecko lizards, having toes ending in small circular sucking-disks, by means of which they adhere to perpendicular surfaces. There are large earlike scales on the back, and small smooth hexagonal ones on the belly. S. notatus is one of the smallest of lizards, about 2 inches long, found in Florida and Cuba; it is notable as the only gecko of the United States. Also Sphaerodactylus.

Sphaerogaster (sfē'rō-gas'tēr), n. [NL. (Zetterstedt, 1842), < Gr. σφαίρα, a ball, < γαστήρ, belly.] A genus of dipterous insects, of the family Aceroceridae, containing one species, S. arcticus, a minute shining-black fly, which occurs from the northernmost point of Lapland to northern Sweden.

Sphaerogastra (sfē'rō-gas'trī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σφαίρα, a ball, < γαστήρ, belly.] A division of arachnidans, containing those whose abdomen is more or less spheroidal or globose, as the spiders: contrasted with Arthrogastra. See cut under spider.

sphaeroid, n. See spheroid.

Sphaeroma (sfē'rō'mī), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1802), < Gr. σφαίρα, anything made round or globular, < σφαίριον, make round or globular, < σφαίρα, a ball, sphero: see sphere.] The typical genus of Sphaeromatidae, so called from their habit of rolling themselves up in a ball when disturbed, like some of the Oniscidae. They are known as globe-slaters. Also Sphaeroma. Leach.

sphaeromere, u. See spheromere.

sphaeromian, a. and n. See spheromian.

Sphaeromidae (sfē'rom'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphaeroma + -idae.] A family of isopod crustaceans, typified by the genus Sphaeroma; the globe-slaters. Also Sphaeromatidae.

sphaerosiderite, n. See sphaerosiderite.

sphaerospore, n. Same as sphaerospore.

sphaerostilbite (sfē'rō-stil'bit), n. [L. sphaerostilbite, < Gr. σφαίρα, a ball, < επίσταλτος, a variety of stilbite.] A variety of stilbite.

Sphaerotheca (sfē'rō-thē'kī), n. [NL. (Léveillé, 1851), < Gr. σφαίρα, a ball, < θήκη, a case.] A genus of pyrenomycetous fungi, belonging to the family Erysiphaceae, characterized by a perithecioid which contains only a single ascus. The appendages are simple threads not unlike the mycelium with which they are frequently interwoven. The ascus is usually suborbicular in shape, and generally contains eight spores. S. humuli, called the hop-mildew, is destructive to the hop-vine; S. pannosa is injurious to rose-bushes; and S. morae-niveae is the common gooseberry-mildew. See hop-mildew.

sphaerotherian (sfē'rō-thē'ri-an), a. and n. [L. sphaerotherian, < Gr. σφαίρα, a ball, < θηρίον, a wild beast.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the genus Sphaerotherium.

2. n. A milloped of the genus Sphaerotherium or family Sphaerotheriidae.

Sphaerotheriidae (sfē'rō-thē'ri-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphaerotherium + -idae.] A family of chilognath myriapods, typified by the genus Sphaerotherium, having aggregated eyes and lateral antennae. Also called Zephroniidae.

Sphaerotherium (sfē'rō-thē'ri-um), n. [NL., (Brandt, 1841), < Gr. σφαίρα, a ball, < θηρίον, a wild beast.] A genus of chilognath myriapods, of the family Glomeridae, and giving name to the Sphaerotheriidae. S. elongatum is an example. Also called Zephronia.

sphaerozoa, n. Plural of sphaerozoön.

sphaerozoid (sfē'rō-zō'id), a. and n. 1. a. Of or pertaining to the Sphaerozoidea.

2. n. A sphaerozoön, or member of the Sphaerozoidea.

Sphaerozoidea (sfē'rō-zō'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphaerozoon + -idae.] A family of spumellarians, or compound radiolarians, typified by the genus Sphaerozoon, with a skeleton composed of numerous detached spicules scattered round the social central capsules, or embedded in their common gelatinous body.

sphaerozoön (sfē'rō-zō'on), n.; pl. sphaerozoa (-ī). [NL.: see Sphaerozoon.] An individual or species of the genus Sphaerozoon or family Sphaerozoidea.

Sphaerozoon (sfē'rō-zō'um), n. [NL., < Gr. σφαίρα, a ball, < ζωον, an animal.] A genus of compound radiolarians, typical of the family Sphaerozoidea, the protoplasm of which contains colored colloid bodies, and gives rise to a network of spicules forming a loose detached skeleton. S. ordinarium is an example. A second species is S. punctatum. See also cut under spicule.

Sphaerozoon ordinarium, magnified.

sphaerule, sphaerulite, etc. See spherule, etc.

Sphagnaceae (sfag-nā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bridel, 1826), < Sphagnum + -aceae.] A monotypic order of mosses; the peat-mosses. They are soft and caespitose plants, generally of large size, growing in more or less compact tufts or patches on the surface of bogs, or floating in stagnant water, more rarely on the borders of mountain rivulets. They are whitish, yellowish, or sometimes red or olive-colored, and are perennial by the annual prolongation of the stems or by simple innovations at the apex. The brachies are generally spreading, in lateral fascicles of from two to seven, rarely more, those at the summit of the stem upright. The leaves are nerveless, translucent, formed of a single layer of two kinds of cells. The lower ones are monolete or dactylole; the male organs (antheridia) are borne upon clavate catkin-like branches, solitary at the side of each leaf, globose or ovoid, pedicellate; the female organs (archegonia) are generally three or four terminating a short branch, only one perfecting fruit and forming a capsule. The capsule is globose, operculate with a convex or nearly flat lid, the orifice naked; the spores are of two kinds. See cut under Sphagnum.

Sphagnei (sfag-nē-i), n. pl. [NL., < L. sphagnos, < Gr. σφάγνός, a kind of moss.] Same as Sphagnaceae.

sphagnicolous (sfag-nik'ō-lus), a. [L. sphagnum + L. colere, inhabit.] In bot. and zool., growing or living upon or among mosses of the genus Sphagnum.

sphagnologist (sfag-nol'ō-jist), n. [L. sphagnologus + -ist.] In bot., a student of the Sphagnaceae; one who is an authority on, or interested in the study of, the Sphagnaceae. Jour. Roy. Micros. Soc., 2d ser., VI, 108.

sphagnology (sfag-nol'ō-jī), n. [L. sphagnum + Gr. -λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] The special study of the Sphagnaceae.

sphagnous (sfag'nus), a. [L. sphagnum + -ous.] In bot., pertaining to bog-mosses or peat-mosses; abounding in bog-or-peat-mosses. See Sphagnum.

Sphagnum (sfag'mum), n. [NL. (Dillenius, 1741), < Gr. σφάγνός, also σφακός, and σφακός, σφακός, a kind of moss.] 1. A genus of mosses, the peat- or bog-mosses, the only representative of the order Sphagnaceae. For characters, see Sphagnaceae. The plants of this genus are widely diffused over the temperate parts of the globe, and enter largely into the composition of peat. There are about 25 North American species and many varieties or forms, about the validity of which the best authorities differ widely. The most divergent forms may be distinguished by well-marked characters, but these seem to merge into one another by a complete series of connecting links. See peat, peat-moss, Bryaceae.

2. [i. c.] A mass or quantity of moss of this genus: often used attributively: as, sphagnum moss; a sphagnum bog.

Sphagolobus (sfā-gol'ō-bus), n. [NL. (Cabanis, 1860), < Gr. σφαίρα, the throat, < λόβος, lobe.] A genus of hornbills, of the family Bucerotidae, characterized by the peculiar form of the casque and by the curly crest. The only species is S. alatus of western Africa, of a blackish color with the tail dark-green and broadly tipped with white.

sphalerite (sfal'e-rit), n. [L. sphaleris, slipper, uncertain (< σπάλλειν, cause to fall, throw down, trip: see fall, fail), < -ite: so named because often confounded with more useful ores.] The native zinc sulphid more familiarly known as zinc-blende. See blende.

Sphagolobus atratus.

sphalerocarpia (sfal'e-rō-kīr'pi-ū), n.; pl. sphalerocarpia (-ī). [NL., < Gr. σφαλερός, slippery, uncertain (see sphalerite), < καρπός, fruit.] In bot., a name proposed for an accessory fruit, as that of Shepherdia, in which the achene is invested by a persistent succulent calyx, which assumes the appearance of a berry.

Sphargididae (sfir-jid'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1839), < Sphargis (Sphargis) + -idae.] A family of chelonians, typified by the genus Sphargis, having a soft, thick, coriaceous carapace not consolidated by the bones, and clawless feet forming mere paddles; the soft-shelled turtles. Only one species is known, the luth, or leather-backed turtle, which reaches a gigantic size. Preferably to be called Dermochelyidae. Also Sphargidae, Sphargidina, Sphargidoidae. See cut under leatherback.

Sphargis (sfir'jis), n. [NL. (Merrem, 1820).] The typical genus of Sphargididae. The species is S. coriacea, the soft-shelled or leather-backed turtle, or trunk-turtle. An earlier and unexceptionable name, and therefore the onym of this genus, is Dermochelys. See cut under leatherback.

Sphecia (sfē'shi-ī), n. [NL. (Hübner, 1816), < Gr. σφήξ (σφήξ), a wasp.] A genus of lepidopterous insects, of the family Agrotidae, having the abdomen moderate and no anal tuft; the hornet-moths. Two European species are the hornet-moth (S. apiformis) and the lunn hornet-moth (S. beneciformis). See Sesta.

Sphedidae (sfes'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., also erroneously Sphedidae, < Sphex (Sphex) + -idae.] A family of fossorial hymenopterous insects, typified by the genus Sphex: same as Sphedidae.

Specicus (sfē'shi-us), n. [NL. (Dahlbom, 1843), < Gr. σφήξ (σφήξ), a wasp.] A notable genus of digger-wasps, of the family Bembecidae, having the middle tibiae armed with two spurs at the apex, and the marginal cell of the fore wings lanceolate. The species are of large size and bright colors. S. speciosus is one of the largest of the Sphæcius speciosus, natural size.

North American solitary wasps, and digs large cylindrical burrows which it stores with stung cicadas, particularly with the dog-day harvest-fly (Cicada tibicen).

Sphæcotheres (sfê-kô-thê-rêz), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816, also Sphæcothera and Sphæcotheca), < Gr. σφῆς (sfê), a wasp, + θῆρ (thêr), hunt, chase.] One of two leading genera of passerine birds, of the family Oriolidae, having the lores and circumocular region naked. There are 4 species, ranging in Australia, New Guinea, Timor, and the Kei Islands. The Australian is S. macularia; the Papuan is S. salvadorii; S. flaviventris inhabits the Kei Islands and parts of Australia; while S. viridis is found in Timor and Sema. Also called Picnorhamphus.

Sphægidæ (sfêj'i-dê), n. pl. [NL. (Westwood, 1840), irreg. < Sphæx (Sphæco) + -idæ.] A family of fossorial hymenoptera, or digger-wasps. The prothorax is narrowed anteriorly, and forms a sort of neck; the basal segment of the abdomen is narrowed into a long, smooth, round petiole; and the head and thorax are usually clothed with a long, thin pubescence. These wasps usually burrow into sand-banks, and provision their cells with caterpillars and spiders. Eighteen genera and about three hundred species are known. Also Sphæcidæ. See sand-wasp, and cuts under digger-wasp, Ammophila, mud-dauber, and Pelopæus.

sphenodone (sfen'dô-nê), n. [< Gr. σφενδόνη, a sling, a head-band, a hoop, etc.] In Gr. archæol.: (a) A form of head-band or fillet worn by women to confine the hair around and on the top of the head. It is characteristically broad in front and narrow behind, being thus opposite in its arrangement to the opisthosphenodone. (b) An elliptical or semi-elliptical area, or any place of kindred form, as the auditorium of a theater; that end of a stadium which was curved or rounded.

The Messenian stadium, which is surrounded by colonnades, has 16 rows of seats in the sphenodone.

C. O. Müller, Manual of Archæol. (trans.), § 290.

sphene (sfên), n. [< F. sphène, in allusion to the wedge shape of the crystals, < Gr. σφῆν, a wedge.] The mineral titanite. The transparent green, greenish-yellow, or yellow varieties frequently exhibit a play of colors as brilliant as that of the yellow or green diamond, showing a strong refractive and dispersive power on light. It is quite soft, the hardness being only 5.5. See titanite.

sphenethmoid (sfê-neth'moid), a. and n. [< sphen(oid) + ethmoid.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the sphenoid and the ethmoid bone; sphenethmoidal; ethmosphenoid: as, the sphenethmoid suture or articulation.—2. Representing or combining characters of both sphenoid and ethmoid: as, the sphenethmoid bone.

II. n. The sphenethmoid bone, as of the frog's skull: one of the cranial bones, situated in front of the parasphenoid. See girdle-bone, and cuts under Anura<sup>2</sup> and Rana.

Also spheno-ethmoid.

sphenethmoidal (sfê-neth-moi'dal), a. [< sphenethmoid + -al.] Same as sphenethmoid.—Sphenethmoidal nerve, a branch of the nasal nerve described by Luschka as passing through the posterior internal orbital canal to the mucous membrane of the posterior ethmoidal cells and the sphenoidal sinus. Called by Krause the posterior ethmoidal nerve.

sphenic (sfê'nik), a. [< Gr. σφῆν, a wedge, + -ic.] Wedge-like.—sphenic number, a number having three unequal factors.

sphenion (sfê'ni-on), n. [NL., < Gr. σφῆν, a wedge.] The apex of the sphenoidal angle of the parietal bone, on the surface of the skull: so called by Von Török. See craniometry.

spheniscan (sfê-nis'kan), n. [< Spheniscus + -an.] A penguin or spheniscomorph; especially, a jackass-penguin of the restricted genus Spheniscus. See cut under Spheniscus.

Spheniscidæ (sfê-nis'i-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Spheniscus + -idæ.] The penguins as a family of squamipennate or brevipennate palmiped natatorial birds, of the order Pygopodes; the only family of Spheniscomorpha, Squamipennes, Impennes, or Ptilopteri, so strongly marked that it is regarded as representing a superfamily, order, or even superorder, though formerly included in the Alcidæ, or ank family. The wings are reduced to flippers, like a seal's or turtle's. They hang by the side, and cannot be closed like those of other birds; in swimming under water they are flapped alternately with a peculiar motion suggesting that of the blades of a screw propeller. They are covered with small scaly feathers in which no remiges can be distinguished, and their bones are peculiarly flat, and not hollow. The feet are four-toed and webbed, with very short broad tarsals, the bones of which are more separate than the metatarsals of any other birds. In walking or standing the whole tarsus rests on the ground, so that the birds are plantigrade; and in swimming under water the feet act mainly as rudders. The beak varies in form in different genera. The plumage is uniformly implanted in the skin, without any apertures; and there is a highly developed system of subcutaneous muscles, contributing to the sinuous movements of the birds under water, suggestive of those of the duck-mole. The feathers of the upper parts and wings are scaly, with thick, flattened shafts and slight webbing. The Spheniscidæ are confined to the southern hemisphere, and abound in cold temperate and antarctic waters, especially about the southern end of Africa and South America, where they live in communities, often of great extent. There are about 14 species, one of which reaches Brazil and another Peru. The generic forms are Aptenodytes, the king penguins, of great size, with slender bill; Pygoscelis, a similar but long-tailed type; Dasyrhamphus, with extensively feathered bill; Eudyptula, of very small size; Eudyptes (or Cataractes), the rock-hoppers, which are crested, and hop instead of waddling; and Spheniscus, the jackass-penguins. There is a fossil penguin, Palæudyptes antarcticus, from the Tertiary of the west coast of Nelson Island, which was a giant, 6 or 7 feet tall. Aptenodytes is a synonym. See the generic names, Spheniscomorpha, and cuts under Eudyptes, metatarsus, penguin, Pygoscelis, Spheniscus, and Squamipennes.

Spheniscinæ (sfê-nis'i-nê), n. pl. [NL., < Spheniscus + -inæ.] The penguins: (a) as a subfamily of Alcidæ; (b) as the only subfamily of Spheniscidæ.

spheniscine (sfê-nis'in), a. [< Spheniscus + -inæ.] Of or pertaining to the Spheniscidæ; spheniscomorphic.

spheniscoid (sfê-nis'koid), a. [< Spheniscus + -oid.] Same as spheniscomorphic.

spheniscomorph (sfê-nis'kô-môrf), n. A penguin as a member of the Spheniscomorpha.

Spheniscomorpha (sfê-nis'kô-môrfê), n. pl. [NL. (Huxley, 1867), < Spheniscus + Gr. μορφή, form.] The penguins as a group of schizognathous carinate birds, represented by the single family Spheniscidæ. See Spheniscidæ.

spheniscomorphic (sfê-nis'kô-môrf'ik), a. [< Spheniscomorpha + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Spheniscomorpha. Also spheniscoid.

Spheniscus (sfê-nis'kus), n. [NL. (Brisson, 1760), < Gr. σφῆνισκος, dim. of σφῆν, a wedge.] 1. In ornith., a genus of penguins, of the family Spheniscidæ, having a stout, compressed beak hooked at the end, and no crest; the jackass-penguins. There are several species, of medium size. S. demersus is found off the Cape of Good Hope. It is bluish-gray or slate-colored above, white below, with a dark mask and single collar cut off by a white band from the other colored parts, the collar extending as a stripe along the sides of the body. The Magellanic penguin, S. magellanicus, of South America, is similar, but has a double collar. S. humboldti is another, inhabiting the coast of Peru. S. minor is a very small species, only about 12 inches long, now placed in another genus, Eudyptula.

Cape Jackass-penguin (Spheniscus demersus).

2. In entom., a genus of heteromorous coleopterous insects, of the family Tenebrionidæ. Kirby, 1817.—3. [l. c.] In math., a sphenic number.

sphenobasilar (sfê-nô-bas'i-lîr), a. [< sphenoid + basilar.] Of or pertaining to the basisphenoid and the basioccipital or basilar process of the occipital bone; basilar, as the suture between these bones. See cuts under craniofacial, skull, and sphenoid.

sphenoccipital (sfê-nôk-sip'i-tal), a. [< sphenoid + occipital.] Of or pertaining to the sphenoid and the occipital bone; occipitosphenoid; sphenobasilar.

Sphenocercus (sfê-nô-sêr'kus), n. [NL. (G. R. Gray, 1840), < Gr. σφῆν, a wedge, + κέρκος, a tail.] A genus of fruit-pigeons or Treroninae, having the tail cuneate. Several species inhabit parts of Asia, Japan, and the East Indies, as S. sphenurus of the Himalayan region, S. sieboldi of Japan, S. korthalsi of Sumatra, S. apicalis of Nepal, S. oxyurus of Java and Borneo, S. formosæ of Formosa. The genus is also called Sphenurus, Sphenacrus, and Sphenotercus.

Wedge-tailed Pigeon (Sphenocercus sphenurus).

Sphenodon (sfê'nô-don), n. [NL., < Gr. σφῆν, a wedge, + δόντις (dônti-s) = E. tooth.] 1. In mammal., a genus of extinct megatheriid edentates, or fossil sloths, remains of which occur in the bone-caves of South America. Lund, 1839.—

2. In herpet.: (a) A genus of extant rhynchocephalous lizards of New Zealand. S. punctatus is known as the tuatara. The name is synonymous with Hatteria. (b) [l. c.] A lizard of this genus. They resemble ordinary lizards externally, but have internal characters representative of an order (Rhynchocephalia). They are now restricted to certain localities in New Zealand, and live chiefly in holes in the sand or about stones on certain rocky islets, though they were formerly abundant in other places. They have been thinned out, it is said, chiefly by logs. Three species are described. See cut under Hatteria.

sphenodont (sfê'nô-dont), a. and n. [< Sphenodon (t-).] 1. a. Having the character of a sphenodon; of or pertaining to the Sphenodontidæ or Hatteriidæ.

II. n. A sphenodont lizard.

Sphenodontidæ (sfê'nô-don'ti-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Sphenodon (t-) + -idæ.] A family of rhynchocephalous reptiles, named from the genus Sphenodon: same as Hatteriidæ.

sphenodontoid (sfê'nô-don'toid), a. and n. [< Sphenodon (t-) + -oid.] Same as sphenodont.

Sphenæacus (sfê-nê-â'kus), n. [NL. (Strickland, 1841), < Gr. σφῆν, a wedge, + αἶαξ (aiak-), a rudder.] A genus of aberrant reed-warblers, of uncertain systematic position. It is remarkable in having only ten tail-feathers, which are stiffened with spiny shafts, and whose webs are lax and decomposed. There are no rectal bristles (as in the related emu-wren: see cut under Stipiturus). There are 6 species, of South Africa, New Zealand, and the Chatham Islands, as S. africanus, S. punctatus of New Zealand, and S. rufescens of the Chathams. Also Sphenæacus and Sphenura.

Sphenænas (sfê-rê'nas), n. [NL., < Gr. σφῆν, a wedge, + αἶναξ, a wild pigeon of the color of ripening grapes, < αἶναξ, αἶνιξ, the vine: see wine.] Same as Sphenocercus.

spheno-ethmoid (sfê-nô-eth'moid), a. and n. Same as sphenethmoid.

spheno-ethmoidal (sfê' nô-eth-moi'dal), a. Same as sphenethmoidal.

sphenofrontal (sfê-nô-fron'tal), a. [< sphenoid + frontal.] Of or pertaining to the sphenoid and the frontal bone; frontosphenoid.—Sphenofrontal suture or articulation, in man, a long horizontal suture between the orbital plates of the frontal bone and the orbitsphenoids, and between the external angular processes of the frontal and the alisphenoids.

sphenogram (sfê'nô-gram), n. [< Gr. σφῆν, a wedge, + γράμμα, a writing, < γράφειν, write.] A cuneiform or arrow-headed character.

sphenographer (sfê-nôg'ra-fêr), n. [< sphenograph + -er.] One versed in sphenography. [Little used.]

sphenographic (sfê-nô-graf'ik), a. [< sphenograph + -ic.] Of or pertaining to sphenography.

sphenographist (sfē-nōg'ra-fist), n. [< sphenograph-y + -ist.] Same as sphenographer.

sphenography (sfē-nōg'ra-fī), n. [< Gr. σφην, a wedge, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] The study and description of cuneiform writings. [Rare.]

sphenoid (sfē-noid), a. and n. [< Gr. σφηνοειδής, wedge-shaped, < σφην, a wedge, + εἶδος, form.] 1. a. Wedge-shaped; wedge-like; specifically, in anat., noting certain cranial bones. See II., 2.—2. Minimum sphenoid diameter, the least transverse diameter of the skull, measured between the temporal fossae.

II. n. 1. In crystal., a wedge-shaped crystalline form contained under four equal isosceles triangles. It is the hemihedral form of the square pyramid of the tetragonal system.—2. In anat., a large and important compound bone of the skull: so called from its shape and connections in man. The cranial articulations are with the occipital, temporal, parietal, frontal, and ethmoid; the facial, with the vomer, malar, palate, and sometimes the superior maxillary. It has a solid median and inferior body, and bears on each side two pairs of wings, greater and lesser, separated by the sphenoidal fissure from each other. It is a collection of bones, not a single bone, its composition including, in man and the mammals generally, (a) a basisphenoid, the principal posterior part of the body of the bone, bearing (b) the alisphenoids, the pair of greater wings, these elements forming with the parietal bones the second or parietal segment of the cranium; (c) the presphenoid, the lesser anterior moiety of the body of the bone, bearing (d) the orbitosphenoids, the pair of lesser wings, or processes of Ingrassias, these forming with the frontal bones the third or frontal cranial segment; (e) a pair of pterygoid bones, the so-called internal pterygoid processes; (f) a pair of spongy bones, the sphenoturbinates. The development of the human sphenoid is from 14 centers of ossification, 8 in the postsphenoid division, and 6 in the presphenoid division. Below mammals, in Sauropsida (birds and reptiles), the sphenoid is simplified by subtraction of the pterygoids, which then form permanently distinct bones, and complicated by the addition of other elements, especially an underlying membrane-bone called the parasphenoid. In Zeuthypoida (amphibians and fishes) further and very great modifications occur. To the sphenoid of man are attached twelve pairs of muscles.

sphenoid (sfē-noid), a. [< sphenoid + -oid.] Same as sphenoid.—Sphenoidal angle. See craniometry.—Sphenoidal crest, the median thin ridge projecting from the anterior surface of the sphenoid bone to articulate with the perpendicular plate of the ethmoid. Also called ethmoidal crest.—Sphenoidal fissure. See fissure.—Sphenoidal fontanelle, the membranous interspace in the infant skull at the junction of the squamous suture with the coronal suture. It often contains a Wormian bone.—Sphenoidal hemihedrism. See hemihedrism.—Sphenoidal process. See process.—Sphenoidal rostrum. (a) The beak, or beak-like part, of the sphenoid bone. In man it is a vertical ridge upon which the vomer rides, forming the sphenovomerine suture or schindylesis. (b) In birds, a rostrate part of the skull which appears to be chiefly, if not entirely, developed from the parasphenoid.—Sphenoidal septum. See septum sphenoidale, under septum.—Sphenoidal sinuses. See sinus.—Sphenoidal spongy bones, the sphenoturbinates.

sphenoides (sfē-noid'ez), n. [NL., < Gr. σφηνοειδής, wedge-shaped: see sphenoid.] 1. In anat., the sphenoid bone: more fully called os sphenoides.—2. [cap.] A genus of coelenterates.

sphenoidium (sfē-noid'dē-um), n.; pl. sphenoidia (-i). [NL.: see sphenoid.] The sphenoid bone, or os sphenoidium.

sphenoido-auricular (sfē-noid'ā-rik'ū-līr), a. In craniom., noting the ratio of the minimum sphenoid diameter of the skull to the minimum auricular diameter: as, the sphenoido-auricular index.

sphenoidofrontal (sfē-noid'fōn'tāl), a. In craniom., noting the ratio of the minimum sphenoid diameter of the skull to the minimum frontal diameter.

sphenoidoparietal (sfē-noid'pā-rī'e-tāl), a. In craniom., noting the ratio of the minimum sphenoid diameter of the skull to the maximum parietal diameter.

sphenomalar (sfē-nō-mā'lār), a. [< sphenoid + malar.] Of or pertaining to the sphenoid and malar bones: as, the sphenomalar articulation, between the alisphenoid and malar bones.—Sphenomalar suture. See suture.

sphenomaxillary (sfē-nō-mak'si-lī-ri), a. [< sphenoid + maxillary.] Relating to the sphenoid and superior maxillary bones.—Sphenomaxillary fissure, fossa, suture, etc. See the nouns.

Sphenomonadidae (sfē-nō-mō-nād'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphenomonas (-monad-) + -idae.] A family of dimastigote eustomatous infusorians, represented by the genus Sphenomonas. These animals are free-swimming; the cuticular surface is indurated; flagella are two in number, one long and one short, both vibratile and extended anteriorly; the oral aperture is succeeded by a distinct tubular pharynx; the endoplasm is colorless, granular; an endoplast and contractile vesicle are conspicuous.

Sphenomonas (sfē-nōm'ō-nās), n. [NL., < Gr. σφην, a wedge, + μονά, solitary, a unit: see monad.] The representative genus of Sphenomonadidae. These animals are of persistent polyhedral prismatic figure, with four or more longitudinal carinae, and two vibratile flagella, a long and a short one. Two fresh-water species are S. quadrangularis and S. octocostatus.

sphenonchus (sfē-nōng'kus), n.; pl. sphenonchi (-ki). [NL., < Gr. σφην, a wedge, + ὄγκος, bulk, mass.] In ichth.: (a) One of the hooked dermal spines of the cephalic armature of certain fossil fishes, as of the genera Hybodus and Acrodus. (b) [cap.] A lapsed genus of fishes, founded on sphenonchi by Agassiz in 1843.

spheno-orbital, spheno-orbital (sfē-nō-ōr'bi-tāl, -tīr), a. Same as sphenorbital.

sphenopalatine (sfē-nō-pāl'ā-tin), a. [< sphenoid + palatine.] Pertaining to the sphenoid and palatine bones. Also sphenopalatal, sphenopalatinat.—Internal sphenopalatine nerve. Same as nasopalatine nerve (which see, under nasopalatine).—Sphenopalatine artery, a branch arising from the third or sphenomaxillary portion of the internal maxillary artery. It passes through the sphenopalatine foramen into the cavity of the nose, and is distributed to the nasal mucous membrane and the membranes of the antrum, ethmoid, and sphenoid cells. Also called nasal artery.—Sphenopalatine foramen, ganglion, notch. See the nouns.—Sphenopalatine nerves, two small branches of the superior maxillary nerve to the sphenopalatine or Meckel's ganglion.—Sphenopalatine vein, a small vein entering the pterygoid plexus.

sphenoparietal (sfē-nō-pā-rī'e-tāl), a. [< sphenoid + parietal.] Pertaining to the sphenoid and parietal bones: as, the sphenoparietal suture.—Sphenoparietal sinus, a small vessel which communicates with the cavernous sinus and middle meningeal veins, and rests in a groove on the under side of the lesser wing of the sphenoid. Breschet.—Sphenoparietal suture. See suture.

sphenopetrosal (sfē-nō-pet-rō-sāl), a. [< sphenoid + petrosal.] Of or pertaining to the sphenoid and petrosal bones; petrosphenoidal.—Sphenopetrosal suture. See suture.

sphenopharyngeus (sfē-nō-far-in-jē'ns), n. [< sphenoid + pharyngeus.] An occasional ovoider muscle of the pharynx which arises from the spine of the sphenoid.

Sphenophorus (sfē-nōf'ō-rus), n. [NL. (Schöenherr, 1838), < Gr. σφην, a wedge, + φόρος, < φέρειν = E. bear.] A notable genus of rhynchophorous beetles, of many species and very wide distribution, having the anterior coxae narrowly separated, and the body beneath glabrous. Nearly 200 species are known, of which 30 inhabit America north of Mexico. Many of them breed in the roots of plants, and so may become pests. The adult beetles also often feed upon plants. Thus S. scutellus feeds upon corn, and S. pulchellus upon the cocklebur (Xanthium).

Sphenophyllum (sfē-nō-fil'um), n. [NL. (Brongniart, 1822), < Gr. σφην, a wedge, + φύλλον, a leaf.] A genus of fossil plants, occurring throughout the whole thickness of the coal-measures, both in Europe and in the United States, and supposed to have been found also in the Lower Silurian, near Cincinnati in Ohio. It is a herbaceous plant, with whorls of wedge-shaped leaves, springing from enlarged articulations, the fructification in cylindrical spikes, with bracts curved upward in a sharp flexure from near the base, and globose sporanges in the axils of the bracts. Sphenophyllum, first thought by Brongniart to belong to the gymnosperms, is now believed to constitute a peculiar type of vegetation, regarded by some authors as related to the rhizocarps, by others as connected with the Calamariae through Asterophyllites.

Sphenophorus pulchellus. a. adult beetle, dorsal view; b. adult beetle, side view in outline (hair-line shows natural size); c. pattern of elytral sculpture, still more enlarged.

Sphenopterygoid (sfē-nōp'tē-rī-goid), a. [< sphenoid + pterygoid.] Common to the sphenoid and pterygoid bones. Also pterygosphenoid.

sphenorbital (sfē-nōr'bi-tāl), a. [< sphenoid + orbital.] Pertaining to the sphenoid bone and the orbits of the eyes; orbitosphenoid. The sphenorbital parts of the sphenoid are the lesser wings, or orbitosphenoids; the sphenorbital fissure is the sphenoidal fissure, or anterior lacerate foramen. See orbitosphenoid. Also spheno-orbital and spheno-orbital.

Sphenorhynchus (sfē-nō-rīng'kus), n. [NL., prop. Sphenorhynchus (Hemprich and Ehrenberg, 1829), < Gr. σφην, a wedge, + ῥιγχος, a snout.] 1. A genus of Cleonidae, the wedge-billed storks, having a sharp straight bill with a membrane saddled on the base of the upper mandible, and no ambigious musculo. The only species is the white-bellied stork or simbl, S. albidus, also called Abdulla sphenorhynchus, of greenish and brownish-purple color and white below, the bill tipped with orange-red. It inhabits Africa, nests in trees, and is regarded with veneration by the natives. See cut under simbl.

2. A genus of South American dendrocolapine birds, now called Glyphorhynchus. Maximilian, 1831.—3. A genus of reptiles. Tschudi, 1838.

sphenosquamosal (sfē-nō-skwa-mō'sāl), a. [< sphenoid + squamosal.] Of or pertaining to the sphenoid and the squamous part of the temporal bone; squamosphenoidal.

sphenotemporal (sfē-nō-tem'pō-rāl), a. [< sphenoid + temporal.] In anat., of or belonging to the temporal and sphenoid bones. Also temporosphenoid.—Sphenotemporal suture. See suture.

sphenotic (sfē-nō'tik), a. and n. [< sphenoid + otic.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the sphenoid bone and the otic capsule, or hard parts of the auditory organ: as, a sphenotic ossification in various fishes. See cut under teleost.

II. n. In ornith., a postfrontal process of bone, or a separate ossification, developed in relation with sphenoid and otic elements, entering into the posterior boundary of the orbital cavity.

sphenotresia (sfē-nō-trē'si-jī), n. [NL., < Gr. σφην, a wedge, + τρήσις, perforation, < τρυπαίνειν (τρυπ), perforate.] The breaking up of the basal portion of the fetal skull in craniotomy.

sphenotribe (sfē-nō-trīb), n. [< Gr. σφην, a wedge, + τριβειν, rub, bruise.] The instrument used in performing sphenotresia.

sphenoturbinale (sfē-nō-tēr'bi-nāl), a. and n. [< sphenoid + turbinale.] 1. a. Sphenoidal and turbinated or whorled or scroll-like; sphenoturbinat: specifically applied, conformably with ethmoturbinale and maxilloturbinale, to the sphenoidal spongy bones. See II.

II. n. One of the sphenoidal spongy bones; one of a pair of small bones situated in front of the body of the sphenoid, in man at birth solid, nodular, distinct from each other and from the sphenoid, afterward fused with the body of the sphenoid as delicate spongy or scroll-like bones which take part in forming the sphenoidal sinuses. Their homologues in other animals are questionable.

sphenoturbinat (sfē-nō-tēr'bi-nāt), a. [< sphenoid + turbinat.] Same as sphenoturbinale.

sphenovomerine (sfē-nō-vom'er-in), a. [< sphenoid + vomerine.] Of or pertaining to the sphenoid bone and the vomer: as, the sphenovomerine suture or schindylesis.

Sphenozamites (sfē-nō-za-mī'tēz), n. [NL. (Brongniart, 1849), < Gr. σφην, a wedge, + NL. Zamites, q. v.] A genus of fossil plants belonging to the eycads, ranging from the Permian to the Jurassic inclusive. They are said by Schimper to bear some resemblance to the problematical Noeggerathia, and, among living forms, to be Human Sphenoid Bone, from above. a., alisphenoid, or greater wing, the lower letter a pointing to its continuation as the external pterygoid process; b., basisphenoid, or main body of the bone; c., pointing to the sphenocipital articulation; d., post-clino process, bounding the pituitary fossa or sella Turcica behind; e., presphenoid, or fore part of the body of the bone; f., orbitosphenoid, or lesser wing; g., internal pterygoid process; h., optic foramen; i., sphenoidal fissure, or foramen lacerum anterius; j., foramen rotundum; k., foramen ovale; l., groove for internal carotid artery, or cavernous groove.

Sphenophorus scutellus. a. adult beetle, dorsal view; b. adult beetle, side view in outline (hair-line shows natural size); c. pattern of elytral sculpture, still more enlarged.

Sphenophorus pulchellus. a. adult beetle, dorsal view; b. adult beetle, side view in outline (hair-line shows natural size).

Sphenozamites

most nearly analogous to Zamia and Encephalartos. See Zamites.

Sphenura (sfē-nū'ra), n. [NL., < Gr. σφην, a wedge, + οὐρά, a tail.] 1. In ornith., a generic name variously applied. (a) An Australian genus of aberrant reed-warblers, with only ten tail-feathers and three pairs of strong recurved rigid bristles. It is quite near Sphenacis (which see), and in part synonymous therewith. There are 3 species, S. brachyptera, S. longirostris, and S. broadbenti. Lichtenstein, 1823. (b) A genus of South American synalaxine birds now called Eusphenura and Thripophaga. Spix, 1824; Sundevall, 1835. (c) A genus of Indian and African birds related to neither of the foregoing, now called Argya (or Argia) and Malcolmia. Bonaparte, 1854.

2. In entom., a genus of coleopterous insects. Dejean, 1834.

spherical (sfēr'ul), a. [< L. sphæralis, of or pertaining to a sphere, globular, < sphæra, < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere: see sphere.] 1. Rounded or formed like a sphere; spheroidal; hence, symmetrical; perfect in form. — 2. Of or pertaining to the spheres or heavenly bodies; moving or revolving like the spheres; hence, harmonious.

Well I know that all things move
To the spherical rhythm of love.

Whittier, Andrew Rykman's Prayer.

The spherical souls that move
Through the ancient heaven of song-illumined air.

Sturtevant.

Carlyle had no faith in . . . the astronomical principle by which the systems are kept in place in the spherical harmony.

The Century, XXVI, 633.

spherality (sfēr'al'i-ti), n. [< spherical + -ity.] The state of being spheral, or having the form of a sphere. [Rare.]

spheraster (sfēr-as'tēr), n. [NL., < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + ἀστήρ, a star.] In sponges, a regular polyact or stellate spicule whose rays coalesce into a spherical figure, as in the genus Geodia; an aster with a thick spherical body. W. J. Sollas.

spheration (sfēr-rā'shon), n. [< sphere + -ation.] Formation into a sphere; specifically, the process by which cosmic matter is formed into a globular or planetary body. [Recent.]

The physical relations accompanying the spheration of a ring are not such as to determine uniformly either direct or retrograde motion.

Winchell, World-Life, p. 123.

sphere (sfēr), n. [Early mod. E. also sphære, sphaere, also sphære (with vowel as in L.); earlier (and still dial.) sperc, < ME. sperc, < OF. esperc, later sphere, F. sphère = Pr. espera = Sp. esfera = Pg. esfera = It. sfera = D. sfeer = G. Sphäre = Dan. sfære = Sw. spher, < L. sphæra, ML. also sphera, spera, < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, globe, sphere, applied to a playing-ball, a sphere as a geometrical figure, the terrestrial globe, the earth, also an artificial globe (so in Strabo, the notion that the earth is a sphere appearing first prob. in Plato), also a star or planet (Plutarch), also a hollow sphere, one of the concentric spheres supposed to revolve around the earth, also a ball (of the eye), a pill, etc.; perhaps lit. 'that which is tossed about' (applied first to a playing-ball), for \*σφαῖρα for \*σπάρα, < σπείρειν, scatter, throw about (see spem, spore); or perhaps connected with σπείρα, a coil, ball, spiro (see spire).] 1. In geom., a solid figure generated by the revolution of a semicircle about its diameter. This is substantially Euclid's definition. The modern definition is a quadric surface having contact with the absolute throughout a cone, and therefore everywhere equidistant from a center. The surface of a sphere is  $4\pi R^2$ , where  $R$  is the radius; its volume is  $\frac{4}{3}\pi R^3$ . Hence — 2. A rounded body, approximately spherical; a ball; a globe.

The Lieutenant's evidence was as round, complete, and lucid as a Japanese sphere of rock-crystal.

O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 55.

3. An orbicular body representing the earth or the apparent heavens, or illustrating their astronomical relations. Hence — 4. The visible supernal region; the upper air; the heavens; the sky. [Poetical.]

Then shall the righteous shine like glorious stars
Within the sphere of heaven.

Sweet Echo, . . .

Sweet queen of parley, daughter of the sphere.
Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 6.

Milton, Comus, l. 241.

An eagle, clang an eagle to the sphere.

Tennyson, Princess, iii.

5. One of the supposed concentric and eccentric revolving rigid and transparent shells called crystalline, in which, according to the old astronomers (following Eudoxus), the stars, sun, moon, and planets were severally set, and by which they were carried in such a manner as to produce their apparent motions. The term is now generally restricted to the sphere of the fixed stars, and is recognized as a convenient fiction. It is also loosely applied to the planets themselves.

After shew'd he hym the nyne spheres;
And after that the melody her'd he

That cometh of thilke spheres threys three,
That welte is of musik and melodye

In this world here and cause of harmonye.
Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 59.

Stand still, you ever-moving spheres of heaven!
Marlowe, Doctor Faustus, v. 4.

Hence — 6. An orbicular field or course of movement; an orbit, as that of a heavenly body or of the eye; a circuit.

As Mars in three-score yeares doth run his sphere, . . .
The sphere of Cupid forty yeares contains.

Spenser, Sonnets, ix.

Make thy two eyes, like stars, start from their spheres.
Shak., Hamlet, l. 5. 17.

7. Place or scene of action; the space within which movement is made or operations are carried on; a circumscribed region of action: as, the sphere of a mission; the spheres (fuller, spheres of influence) of the different European powers and trading companies in Africa.

The four elements wherof the body of man is compacte . . . be set in their places called spheres, higher or lower accordynge to the soneralitye of their natures.

Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, l. 1.

All this while the King had mov'd within his own sphere, and had done nothing out of the Realm.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 403.

Our South African sphere seems better suited for European settlement than is the Tunisian protectorate of France.

Sir C. W. Dilke, Probs. of Greater Britain, v.

8. Position or rank in society; position or class with reference to social distinctions.

Pleas'd, or not pleas'd, If we be Englands King,
And mightiest in the Sphere in which we move,
Wee'll shine alone, this Phaeton cast downe.

Heywood, Royal King (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, VI. 20).

I saw her (Marie Antoinette) just above the horizon, decorating and cheering the elevated sphere she just began to move in.

Burke, Rev. in France.

9. Circuit or radius, as of knowledge, influence, or activity; definite or circumscribed range; determinate limit of any mental or physical course: as, the sphere of diplomacy.

This being wholly out of my sphere, I can give no account of them.

Dampier, Voyages, II. l. 126.

Nature to each pilots his proper Sphere.

Congreve, Of Pleasing.

Armillary sphere. See armillary. — Axis of a sphere. See axis. — Circles of the sphere. See circle. — Colloid, dialing, direct sphere. See the qualifying words. — Copernican sphere, an armillary sphere with the addition of a second sphere representing the sun, central to a divided circle representing the ecliptic. — Doctrine of the sphere, the elements of the geometry of figures drawn upon the surface of a sphere. — Epidermic spheres. Same as epithelial pearls (which see, under pearl). — Geometry of spheres, a branch of geometry in which the lines of Plucker's geometry of lines are replaced by spheres, and the intersections of lines by the contact of spheres. — Harmony or music of the spheres. See harmony. — Logical sphere, the subject or ultimate antecedent of a statement, or the objects which a term denotes. — Magic sphere. See magic. — Oblique sphere, the sphere of the heavens, or another sphere representing that, as it appears at a station where the angle between the equator and the horizon is oblique. The right sphere is the same sphere for an equatorial station where the angle is a right angle, and the parallel sphere is the same where the angle vanishes — that is, for a polar station. — Osculating sphere of a non-plane curve, the sphere through four consecutive points of the curve. — Parallel circles on a sphere. See parallel. — Parallel sphere. See oblique sphere. — Power of a sphere in regard to another, the squared distance of the two centers less the sum of the squares of the radii. Clifford. — Projection of the sphere, a sphere orthogonally cutting four spheres having their centers at the summits of the tetrahedron of coordinates. — Right sphere. See oblique sphere. — Sector of a sphere. See sector. — Segmentation sphere. See segmentation. — Segment of a sphere. See segment. — Sphere at infinity. See infinity, 3. — Twelve-point sphere. (a) A sphere (discovered by Prouhet in 1863) be## spherical

longing to a tetrahedron in which the four perpendiculars from the summits upon the opposite faces intersect in one point, this sphere passing through the four feet of these perpendiculars and consequently also through the centers of gravity of the four faces, and through the mid-points of the lines from the vertices to the common intersections of the perpendiculars aforesaid. (b) More generally, a sphere (discovered in 1884 by the Italian mathematician Intrigilla) belonging to any tetrahedron, and passing through the four feet of the perpendiculars from the summits upon the opposite faces, and consequently also through the mid-points of the lines from the summits to the center of the hyperboloid of which these perpendiculars are generators, and through the orthogonal projections of these points upon the opposite faces. = Syn. 1-3. Orb, Ball, etc. See globe.

sphere (sfēr), v. t.; pret. and pp. sphered, ppr. sphering. [< sphere, n.] 1. To make into a sphere; make spherical; round, or round out; fill out completely.

Blow, villain, till thy sphered bias cheek
Outswell the colic of puff'd Aquilon.

Shak., T. and C., iv. 5. 8.

2. To place in a sphere or among the spheres; ensphere.

And therefore is the glorious planet Sol
In noble eminence enthroned, and sphered
Amidst the other.

Shak., T. and C., l. 3. 90.

Light . . . from her native east
To journey through the airy gloom began,
Sphered in a radiant cloud; for yet the sun
Was not.

Milton, P. L., vii. 247.

Because I would have reach'd you, had you been Sphered up with Cassiopeia.

Tennyson, Princess, iv.

3. To inclose as in a sphere or orbit; encircle; engirdle.

When any towne is spher'd
With siege of such a foe as kills men's minds.

Chapman, Illad, xviii. 185.

4. To pass or send as in a sphere or orbit; circulate. [Rare.]

We'll still sit up,
Sphering about the wassail cup
To all those times

Which gave me honour for my rhimes.

Herrick, His Age.

sphere-crystals (sfēr'kris'talz), n. pl. In bot., same as sphaeraphides.

sphereless (sfēr'les), a. [< sphere + -less.] Having no sphere; wandering; unrestrained.

Let the horsemen's scimitars
Wheel and flash, like sphereless stars, Thirsting to eclipse their burning
In a sea of death and mourning.

Shelley, Masque of Anarchy, st. 79.

sphere-yeast (sfēr'yēst), n. In bot., an aggregation of certain sprouting forms of the genus Mucor: formerly so called from a resemblance in shape to the saccaromycete of yeast.

spheric (sfēr'ik), a. [= F. sphérique = Sp. esférico = Pg. esférico = It. sferico, < L. sphaericus, < Gr. σφαῖρικός, of or pertaining to a ball, < σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere: see sphere.] Of or pertaining to a sphere or the spheres; spherelike; spherical.

Up the spheric circles, circle above circle.
Mrs. Browning, Drama of Exile.

Let any sculptor hew us out the most ravishing combination of tender curves and spheric softness that ever stood for woman.

S. Lanier, The English Novel, p. 273.

spherical (sfēr'ik-al), a. [< spheric + -al.] 1. Bounded by or having the form of the surface of a sphere: as, a spherical body; a spherical surface; a spherical shell.

We must know the reason of the spherical figures of the drops.

Glanville.

2. Pertaining or relating to a sphere or spheres, or to sphericity: as, a spherical segment or section; spherical trigonometry. — 3. Relating to the planets; planetary, in the astrological sense.

We make guilty of our disasters the sun, the moon, and the stars: as if we were villains by necessity; fools by heavenly compulsion; knaves, thieves, and treachers by spherical predominance.

Shak., Lear, i. 2. 134.

Adjunct spherical function. See function. — Center of spherical curvature. See center. — Concave spherical mirror. See mirror, 2. — Line of spherical curvature. See line, 2. — Spherical aberration. See aberration, 4. — Spherical angle. See angle, 3. — Spherical bracketing, in arch. an arrangement of brackets for the support of lath-and-plaster work forming a spherical surface. — Spherical compasses, a kind of calipers for measuring globular bodies, variously constructed. — Spherical complex, the aggregate of all the spheres in space fulfilling a single geometrical condition. — Spherical congruence, the aggregate of all the spheres in space fulfilling two geometrical conditions. — Spherical conic section. See conic. — Spherical coordinates. See coordinates. — Spherical curvature, epicycloid, excess function, geometry. See the nouns. — Spherical cyclic, a curve which is the intersection of a sphere with a quadric surface. — Spherical group, the spherical complex determined by a linear equation between the coordinates and the power of the center of the variable circle. — Spherical harmonic. Same as Laplace's function (which see, under function). — Spherical indicatrix. See indicatrix. — Spherical inversion. See geometrical inversion, under inversion.—Spherical lune, the portion of the surface of a sphere included between two great circles.—Spherical nucleus. Same as nucleus globosus (which see, under nucleus).—Spherical pencil, a singly infinite continuous series of spheres determined like a spherical group, but by three equations.—Spherical polygon. See polygon.—Spherical representation, a mode of continuous correspondence between the points of a surface and the points of a sphere, each radius of the sphere through the center representing the parallel normal of the surface. Any part of the sphere considered as thus representing a part of the surface is called its spherical image.—Spherical saw, a saw made in the form of a segment of a sphere, used for sawing out curvilinear work. See cut and under saw.—Spherical sclere. See sclere and spheraster.—Spherical-shot machine, a machine for finishing cannon-balls by molding and pressing to a true spherical form. E. H. Knight.—Spherical surface-harmonic. See harmonic.—Spherical triangle, trigonometry, etc. See the nouns.

spherically (sfor-i-kal-i), adv. In the form of a sphere, or of part of a sphere; so as to be spherical.

sphericalness (sfor-i-kal-nes), n. The state or property of being spherical; sphericity. [Rare.] Impr. Dict.

sphericity (sfō-ris'i-ti), n. [= F. sphericité; as spheric + -ity.] The character of being in the shape of a sphere.

sphericle (sfor-i-kl), n. [Dim. of sphere.] A small sphere; a spherulo. [Rare.] Impr. Dict.

spherics (sfor'iks), n. [Pl. of spheric (see -ies).] Geometry of figures drawn on the surface of a sphere; specifically, spherical trigonometry.

spheriform (sfō-rī-fōrm), a. [< L. sphaera, sphere, + forma, form.] Formed or existing as a sphere; sphere-shaped; spherical. Cudworth, Intellectual System, II. 23. [Rare.]

spherocobaltite (sfō-rō-kō'bāl-tit), n. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + L. cobalt + -ite.] Carbonate of cobalt, a rare mineral occurring in small spherical masses with concentric radiated structure, and having a peach-blossom red color.

spheroconic (sfō-rō-kon'ik), n. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + κώνος, a cone; see conic.] A non-plane curve, the intersection of a sphere with a quadric cone having its vertex at the center of the sphere.—Cyclic arcs of the spheroconic, the intersections of the cyclic planes of the cone with the sphere.—Reciprocal spheroconic, the envelope of the great circles of which the points on the first spheroconic are the poles.

spheroecrystal (sfō-rō-kris'tal), n. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + κρυστάλλος, crystal.] 1. In lithol., a mineral occurring in spherical form with fibrous radiate structure.—2. pl. In bot., same as sphaeraphides.

spheroactyl (sfō-rō-dak'til), a. Of or pertaining to the genus Spheroactylus, as a gecko.

spheroastric (sfō-rō-gas'trik), a. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + ἀστρίον, stonnel.] Having spherical or globular abdomen, as a spider; of or pertaining to the Spheroastris. See cut under honey-beaver.

spherograph (sfō-rō-gráf), n. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + γράφω, write.] A mechanical instrument consisting of a stereographic projection of the sphere upon a disk of pasteboard, in which the meridians and parallels of latitude are laid down to single degrees. By the aid of this projection, and a ruler and index, the angular position of a ship at any place, and the distance sailed, may be readily and accurately determined on the principle of great-circle sailing.

spheroid (sfō'roid), n. [Also sphaeroid; = F. sphéroïde, < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + εἶδος, form.] 1. A geometrical body approximating to a sphere, but not perfectly spherical.—2. In geom., a solid generated by the revolution of an ellipse about one of its axes. When the generating ellipse revolves about its longer or major axis, the spheroid is prolate or oblong; when about its less or minor axis, the spheroid is oblate. The earth is an oblate spheroid—that is, flattened at the poles, so that its polar diameter is shorter than its equatorial diameter. (See earth, I.) The same figure is assumed by the other planets; hence the properties of the oblate spheroid are of great importance in geodesy and astronomy.—Universal spheroid, a surface generated by the revolution of an ellipse about any diameter.

spheroidal (sfō-ro'i-dal), a. [< spheroid + -al.] 1. Of or pertaining to, or having the form of, a spheroid.—2. In crystal., globoso; bounded by several convex faces.—3. In entom., round and prominent, appearing like a ball or sphere partly buried in the surface: as, spheroidal eyes; spheroidal coxae.—Spheroidal bracketing, in arch., bracketing which has a spheroidal surface.—Spheroidal epithelium. See epithelium.—Spheroidal state or condition, the condition of water or other liquid when, on being placed on a highly heated surface, as red-hot metal, it assumes the form of a more or less flattened spheroid, and evaporates without ebullition.

The spheroid in this condition does not touch the surface of the metal, but floats on a layer of its own vapor, and evaporates rapidly from its exposed surface. It is heated mainly by radiation from the hot surface, since the layer of intervening vapor conducts heat very feebly. The formation of a layer of non-conducting vapor explains why it is possible to dip the wetted hand into molten iron with impunity. It is sometimes spoken of as the caloric or calorific paradox.

spheroidally (sfō-ro'i-dal-i), adv. In a spheroidal manner; so as to form a spheroid or spheroids.

The great mass . . . is largely built up of spheroidally jointed rock. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLIV. 450.

spheroidic (sfō-ro'i-dik), a. [= F. sphéroïdique; as spheroid + -ic.] Same as spheroidal. [Rare.]

spheroidal (sfō-ro'i-di-kal), a. [< spheroidic + -al.] Same as spheroidal. [The usual old form.]

The same spheroidal form. Jefferson, Correspondence, II. 67.

spheroidicity (sfō-ro-i-dis'i-ti), n. [< spheroidic + -ity.] The state or character of being spheroidal.

Spheroma, n. See Sphaeroma.

spheromere (sfō-rō-mōr), n. [Also sphaeromere; < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + μέρος, a part.] One of the radially arranged parts or symmetrical segments of any radiate; an actinometer. Perhaps the most remarkable spheromeres are those two which, in the Venus's-girdle, give that ctenophoran a ribbon-like figure by their enormous development. See cut under Cestum.

spherometer (sfō-rom'e-tēr), n. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + μέτρον, measure.] An instrument for measuring the radii of spheres; a sphere-measurer. It is of especial service to opticians in determining the focal lengths, etc., of lenses. The common form (see figure) consists of a vertical screw c, with a large graduated head a, turning in a socket supported by three legs whose hard steel points are exactly equidistant. The fixed scale b at the side, together with the graduated screw-head, makes it possible to measure with great accuracy the distance between the extremity of the screw and the plane passing through the ends of the three supports, when, for example, all the points are in contact with the surface of the sphere. If, in addition, the distance between the ends of the supports is known, a simple calculation gives the radius of the sphere. The same instrument may also be used to determine with precision the thickness of a plate, as (in the figure) A, placed upon a horizontal surface.

Spherometer.

spheromian (sfō-rō-mi-ni), a. and n. [< Sphaeroma + -ian.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to Sphaeroma or the Sphaeromidae. 2. n. A globe-slayer.

Also spelled sphaeromian.

spherpolar (sfō-rō-pō-lār), a. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, sphere, + E. polar.] Reciprocal relatively to a sphere. The plane through the points of contact of a cone with a sphere is the spherpolar of the vertex.

spherosiderite (sfō-rō-sid'ē-rīt), n. [Also sphaerosiderite; < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + σιδήρεος, of iron; see siderite.] A variety of the iron carbonate siderite, occurring in globular concretionary forms.

spherospore (sfō-rō-spōr), n. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, + E. spore.] In bot., same as tetraspore.

spherular (sfer'ū-lār), a. [< spherule + -ar.] 1. Having the form of a spherule; resembling a spherule.—2. Of or pertaining to a spherulite; spherulitic.

Spherular bodies consisting of radially-aggregated fibres of a single mineral. Nature, XXXIX. 315.

spherulate (sfer'ū-lāt), a. [< spherule + -ate.] In entom., having one or more rows of minute rounded tubercles; studded with spherules.

spherule (sfer'ūl), n. [Also sphaerule; < L. sphaerula, dim. of sphaera, a ball, sphere; see sphere.] A little sphere or spherical body. Quicksilver, when poured upon a plane surface, divides itself into a great number of minute spherules.

spherulite (sfer'ū-lit), n. [Also sphaerulite; < spherule + -ite.] 1. A vitreous globule, such as those of which perlite is made up, having a more or less perfectly developed concentric and at the same time decidedly radiating fibrous structure. The highly siliceous volcanic rocks not unfrequently have a spherulitic structure.—2. Same as radiolite. 2.—Spherulite rock, in geol., a rock of which the predominating part has a spherulitic structure.

spherulitic (sfer'ū-lit'ik), a. [< spherulite + -ic.] Made up of or containing spherulites; having the character of a spherulite. Also sphaerulitic.

spherulitize (sfer'ū-lit'iz), v. t.; prot. and pp. spherulitized, ppr. spherulitizing. [< spherulite

+ -ize.] To convert more or less completely into spherulites, or cause to assume a spherulitic structure, wholly or in part. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLV. 250.

spherulitoid (sfer'ū-li-toid), a. [< spherulite + -oid.] Having more or less perfectly the form of a spherulite. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLV. 248.

sphery (sfēr'i), a. [< sphere + -y.] 1. Belonging to the spheres.

She can teach ye how to climb Higher than the sphery chime.
Milton, Comus, l. 1021.

2. Resembling a sphere or star in roundness, brightness, or other attribute.

What wicked and dissembling glass of mine
Made me compare with Hermia's sphery eye?
Shak., M. N. D., II. 2. 99.

spheterize (sfet'e-riz), v. t.; pret. and pp. spheterized, ppr. spheterizing. [< Gr. σφαιρίζω, make one's own, < σφαῖρα, their own, poss. adj. of the 3d pers. pl., < σφαῖρα, they.] To take to one's self; appropriate as one's own. Burke. [Rare.] (Encyc. Diet.)

Sphex (sfoks), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1758), < Gr. σφῆξ, a wasp; soo wasp.] 1. A notable genus of large handsome digger-wasps, typical of the family Sphecidae (or Sphecidæ or Sphegidae). They abound in tropical regions, but some 12 species inhabit the United States. S. ichneumon digs rapidly in hard ground, and provisions its cells with grasshoppers. About 100 species are known. See cut under digger-wasp.

2. [E.] A wasp of this genus.

sphex-fly (sfeks'fli), n. One of numerous different dipterous insects, as of the genus Conops, which resemble a sphex in some respects.

sphiggure (sfīg'ūr), n. See sphingure.

sphincter (sfingkt'ēr), n. [NL., < L. sphincter, < Gr. σφιγκτηρ, anything which binds tight, a lace, a band, < σφίγγω, shut tight, close.] An orbicular, circular, or annular musculo-surrounding and capable of closing a natural orifice or passage of the body.—Oral sphincter. Same as orbicularis oris (which see, under orbicularis).

—Sphincter ani, the sphincter of the anus, under which name two distinct muscles are known. (a) The sphincter ani proper, sphincter externus, or external sphincter is a thin, flat plane of voluntary muscular fibers supplied by hemorrhoidal branches of nerves from the sacral plexus, surrounding the anus, subcutaneous and intimately adherent to the integument, of elliptical form 3 or 4 inches in long diameter, and an inch wide across. It arises from the tip of the coccyx, and is inserted into the tendinous raphe of the perineum. Like most sphincters, it consists of symmetrical lateral halves united by a raphe in front of and behind the opening it incloses. (b) The sphincter recti, sphincter internus, or internal sphincter surrounds the lower end of the rectum, forming a muscular ring about an inch in extent and a quarter of an inch thick, and consists of an aggregation and thickening of the circular fibers of the gut. This sphincter is involuntary, and in health maintains its tonic contractility, which yields by reflex action to the pressure of the contents of the bowel.—Sphincter oculi, or sphincter palpebrarum, the orbicular muscle of the eyelids, which surrounds and closes them. Usually called orbicularis palpebrarum. See cut under muscle.—Sphincter oris, the oral sphincter. See orbicularis oris, under orbicularis.—Sphincter pupillaris, the circular or concentric fibers of the iris, whose contraction makes the pupil smaller. Also called sphincter pupillæ and sphincter iridis.—Sphincter pylori. See pylorus.—Sphincter recti, the internal sphincter ani (see above).

—Sphincter vaginae, an elliptical muscle surrounding the orifice of the vagina, corresponding to the bulbocavernosus of the male. Also called constrictor vaginae.—Sphincter vesicae, the unstriped involuntary muscular fibers around the neck of the urinary bladder.—Sphincter vesicae externus, the partly plain partly striated muscular fibers which surround the prostatic part of the urethra. Also called sphincter prostaticus and sphincter of Henle.

sphincteral (sfingkt'ēr-al), a. [< sphincter + -al.] Same as sphincterial.

sphincterate (sfingkt'ēr-āt), a. [Also sphinctrate; < sphincter + -ate.] 1. In anat. and zool., provided with a sphincter; closed or closable by means of a sphincter.—2. Constricted or constricted as if by a sphincter: thus, an hour-glass is sphincterate in the middle.

sphincterial (sfingkt'ēr-i-al), a. [< sphincter + -ial.] Of or pertaining to a sphincter or its function: as, a sphincterial muscle; sphincterial fibers; sphincterial action.

sphincteric (sfingkt'ēr-ik), a. [< sphincter + -ic.] Same as sphincterial.

sphincterotomy (sfingkt'ēr-ōt'ō-mi), n. [< Gr. σφιγκτηρ, a sphincter, + -τομία, < τέμνω, τμήν, cut.] The operation of cutting a sphincter to prevent its spasmodic action.

sphinctrate (sfingkt'ēr-āt), a. Same as sphincterate.

Sphindidae (sfīn'di-dæ), n. pl. [NL., < Sphindus + -idae.] An aberrant family of sericicorn beetles, in which the antennae are so obviously clavate as to resemble those of the clavicorn series. It contains a few small species found in fungi which grow upon the trunks of trees.

Sphinxus (sfín'dus), n. [NL. (Chevrolat, 1833), a made word.] The typical genus of the Sphingidae. Only 3 species are known, one of which is North American.

Sphingidae (sfín'jī-dō), n. pl. [NL. (Leach, 1819), < Sphinx (Sphing-) + -idæ.] An important family of holorocorous lepidopterous insects, with fusiform antennae, typified by the genus Sphinx, including all those commonly known as sphinxes, sphinx-moths, hawk-moths, or humming-bird moths. The body is robust; the abdomen is stout, conical, often tufted; the tongue is usually long and strong; the antennae have a hook at the tip; the wings are comparatively small and narrow, the fore wings acute at the tip. They are diurnal or crepuscular in habit, a few flying in the hottest sunshine, but the majority in the twilight. The larva are large, naked, usually green in color, and generally furnished with a prominent caudal horn, which is sometimes replaced after the last molt by a shining lenticular tubercle. When full-grown they either pupate above ground, between leaves, in a slight cocoon, or more generally go deep under ground, and transform in an earthen cell. The long-tongued species have a special free and characteristic tongue-case. The species of temperate regions are divided into four principal subfamilies: Macroglossinae, Chamaecampinae, Sphinginae, and Smerinthinae. From America north of Mexico 83 species have been described, about 50 from Europe, and rather more than 600 for the entire world. Also Sphingides, Sphingidi, Sphingina, Sphingoides, and Sphingoides. See cuts under hog-caterpillar, Philampetus, hawk-moth, Lepidoptera, and sphinx.

sphingiform (sfín'jī-fōrm), a. [< NL. Sphinx (Sphing-) + L. forma, form.] In entom., resembling a moth of the family Sphingidae.

sphingine (sfín'jin), a. Resembling a sphinx or hawk-moth; of or pertaining to the Sphingidae; sphingoid or sphingiform.

sphingoid (sfing'gōid), a. [< NL. Sphinx (Sphing-) + -oid.] Like a sphinx or hawk-moth; sphingine or sphingiform.

sphingure (sfing'gūr), n. [= F. sphingure: see Sphingurus.] A member of the genus Sphingurus.

Sphingurinae (sfing-gū-rī-nō), n. pl. [NL., < Sphingurus + -inae.] The American porcupines; a subfamily of Hystrioidae, of more or less completely arboreal habits, represented by four genera, Sphingurus, Syntherisma, Chaetomys, and Erethizon: so named by E. R. Alston in 1876. It corresponds to the Syntherisma of Cuvier (1823), the Syntherisma of J. A. Allen (1877), and the Cercolabinae (as a subfamily of Spalacopidae) of Lilljeborg (1872) and Gill (1872). See cuts under porcupine and prehensile.

sphingurine (sfing'gū-rīn), a. Of or belonging to the Sphingurinae; syntherine; cercolabine.

Sphingurus (sfing-gū-rus), n. [NL. (F. Cuvier, 1822), in form Sphingurus, < Gr. σφίγξ, throttle, strangle (see sphinx), + οὐρά, tail.] The typical genus of Sphingurinae, having the tail prehensile, all four feet four-toed, and little development of spines. It is closely related to Syntherisma; but the latter is more spiny, and has a broad, highly arched frontal region. The two genera are united by Brandt under the name Cercolabes. Each has several Neotropical species in Central and South America, east of the Andes, from southeastern Mexico and the West Indies to Paraguay.

sphinx (sfings), n.; pl. sphinxes, sphinxes (sfing'kez, sfín'jēz). [= F. sphinx = Sp. esfinge = Pg. esfinge = It. sfinge = G. sphinx, < L. sphinx, < Gr. σφίγξ (σφίγγ-), Aëolic σίγ, n. sphinx (Theban or Egyptian: see defs. 1 and 2); supposed to mean lit. 'strangler,' the story being that the Sphinx strangled those who could not solve her riddles; < σφίγγιν, throttle, strangle, orig. bind, compress, fix; prob. = L. figere, fix (see fix); by some connected with L. fascis, a bundle: see fascis.] 1. [cap. or l. c.] In Gr. myth., a female monster, said to have proposed a riddle to the Thebans who passed her as she sat on a rock by the roadside, and to have killed all who were not able to guess it. The riddle, according to tradition, inquired what being has successively four, two, and three feet, and is weakest when it has most feet. Edipus answered, Man, who creeps in infancy, afterward goes erect, and finally walks with a staff (a third foot). The Sphinx, in compliance with her own conditions, thereupon threw herself from her rock and died. In art this monster is represented with the body of a lion or a dog, winged, and the head and often the breasts of a woman.

For valour, is not Love a Hercules? . . .
Subtle as Sphinx. Shak., L. L., iv. 3. 342.

In the third [court] . . . are two Sphinxes very curiously carved in brass.

Coryal, Crudities, 1. 85.

2. In Egypt, antig., a figure somewhat similar in composition to the Greek, having the body of a lion (never winged), and a man's human head or an animal head. The human-headed figures have been called androsphinxes; those with the head of a ram, criosphinxes; and those with the head of a hawk, hierosphinxes. Egyptian sphinxes are symbolical figures, having no connection with the Greek fable; and the Greeks probably applied the term sphinx to the Egyptian statues merely on account of the accidental external resemblance between them and their own conception. The Egyptian sphinxes were commonly placed in avenues leading to temples or tombs. The most celebrated example is the Great Sphinx near the great pyramids of Ghizeh, hewn out of solid granite, with the recumbent body of a lion, 146 feet long from the shoulders to the rump, and 66 feet high, and a man's head 23½ feet high from chin to crown. A small temple stood between the fore paws of this sphinx. There are also Oriental sphinxes, in general akin to the Egyptian, but more often winged than wingless. See cut under androsphinx.

3. In her., a creature with a lion's body and a woman's head, but not necessarily like any ancient original. It is assumed to be winged; when not winged, it should be blazoned "sans wings."—4. An enigmatic or sphinx-like person; one who talks puzzlingly, or is inscrutable in disposition or character; one whom it is hard to understand.—5. In entom.: (a) A hawk-moth; a member of the genus Sphinx or the family Sphingidae. See cuts under hawk-moth, hog-caterpillar, Lepidoptera, and Philampetus. (b) [cap.] [NL. (Linnaeus, 1767).] The typical genus of the family Sphingidae. At first it was co-extensive with this family; later it formed a group of variable extent; now it is confined to forms having the head small, the eyes lashed, tibiae spinose, and fore tarsi usually armed with long spines. It is a wide-spread genus; 10 species occur in America north of Mexico. The larvae of this, as well as of other groups of the family Sphingidae, have the habit of erecting the head and anterior segments, from which Linnaeus derived a fanciful resemblance to the Egyptian Sphinx (whence the name).

G. The Guinea baboon, Cynocephalus papio or Papio sphinx. Also called sphinx-baboon.—Abbot's sphinx, Thyreus abboti, a small North American sphinx whose larva feeds on the vine.—Achemon sphinx, Philampetus achemon. See cuts of moth and larva under Philampetus.—Blind-eyed sphinx, Protonotaria exocretus, a handsome American moth, of a general fawn color, with roseate hind wings ornamented with a blue-centered eyespot, whose larva lives upon the apple.—Carolina sphinx, Protoparce carolina, a mottled gray and black moth whose larva is the tobacco-worm. See cut under tobacco-worm.—Catalpa sphinx, Ceratomia catalpa, an American moth whose larva feeds on the catalpa.—Clear-winged sphinx, a moth whose wings are partly hyaline, as Temaris diffusa and other members of the same genus; also, improperly, certain of the Scritidae. See cut under raspberry-borer.—Death's-head sphinx, Acherontia atropos. See cut under death's-head.—Five-spotted sphinx, Protoparce celer, a common gray North American moth whose abdomen is marked with five orange spots on each side, and whose larva feeds upon the tomato, potato, and other solanaceous plants. See cut under tomato-worm.—Morning sphinx, any species of the genus Deilephila, as D. faecula, the white-lined morning-sphinx, a common American moth of striking ing coloration, whose larva feeds on purslane.—Satellite sphinx. See satellite-sphinx (with cut).—Walnut-sphinx, Cressonia juglandis, an American moth whose larva feeds on the walnut.

sphinx-moth (sfings'móth), n. Same as sphinx, 5 (a).

sphragide (sfraj'id), n. [< F. sphragide, < L. sphragis, < Gr. σφραγίς, a signet, a seal.] Same as Lemnian earth (which see, under Lemnian).

sphragistics (sfra-jis'tiks), n. [< Gr. σφραγιστικός, of, for, or pertaining to sealing, < σφραγίζω, seal, < σφραγίς, a seal.] The study of seals and the distinctions among them; the archaeology of seals. This study is similar in its nature to numismatics, and has been of great use in the history of the middle ages, as well as in the investigation of costume, armor, etc.; it is also of value in connection with the documents to which seals are attached, as aiding in their classification and in the proof of their authenticity.

sphrigosis (sfri-gō'sis), n. [NL., for "sphrigrasis;" < Gr. σφρίγγω, be full and vigorous, + -osis.] Over-rankness in fruit-trees and other plants. It is a disease in which the plant tends to grow to wood or stems and leaves in place of fruit or bulb, etc., or to grow luxuriantly that the nutritious qualities of the product are injured, as in the turnip and potato. Sphrigosis is sometimes due to over-manuring, sometimes to constitutional defect. Compare rankness, 4.

sphygmie (sfig'mik), a. [< Gr. σφύγμικος, pertaining to the pulse, < σφύγμις, the beating of the heart, the pulse: see sphygmus.] 1. Of or pertaining to the pulse.—2. In zool., pulsating or pulsatile; beating with rhythmic contraction and dilatation, like a pulse; specifically, belonging to the Sphygmica.

Sphygmica (sfig'mi-kī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σφύγμικος, pertaining to the pulse: see sphygmie.] A group or series of amœbiform protozoans, in which regularly contractile or sphygmie vacuoles are observed. See Amœboides.

sphygmogram (sfig'mō-gram), n. [< Gr. σφύγ-

Sphygmogram.

μύς, pulse, + γράφω, a writing.] A tracing of the changes of tension at a point in an artery, as obtained with a sphygmograph.

sphygmograph (sfig'mō-gráf), n. [< Gr. σφύγμύς, pulso, + γράφω, write.] An instrument which, when applied over an artery, traces on Sphygmograph.

a, hand by which the instrument is fastened on; b, spring which rests upon the artery; c, adjusting-screw (with graduated head) which regulates the pressure of the spring b according as the pulse is strong or weak; d, d', supports for paper upon which the tracing is made; e, feed roller, between which and the pressure-wheels c, e, the paper is carried; f, spring which bears on the shaft of the wheels c, e to engage the paper positively; g, small spring clockwork (incased) by which motion is imparted to the feed-roller e; h, milled-headed winding-key; i, stop-motion; j, tracer attached to the oscillating arm k, which is moved by the rod l that connects this arm with the spring b.

Sphinx.—Greek sculpture in the British Museum.

n piece of paper moved by clockwork a curve which indicates the changes of tension of the blood within. The paper is blackened by holding it over a smoking lamp, and the tracer, moving in accordance with the pulsations of the artery, indicates the rapidly, strongly, and uniformly of the beats. The tracings are preserved by a thin varnish of gum damar dissolved in benzolin.

sphygmographic (sfīg-mō-graf'ik), a. [< sphygmograph + -ic.] Of or pertaining to, or registered or traced by, the sphygmograph.

sphygmography (sfīg-mō-grā-fī), n. [As sphygmograph + -y.] 1. The act or art of taking pulse-tracings or sphygmograms. — 2. A description of the pulse.

sphygmoid (sfīg-mō'id), a. [< Gr. σφύγμός, pulse, + -oid, form.] Pulse-like.

sphygmology (sfīg-mō-lō-jī), n. [< Gr. σφύγμός, pulse, + -λογία, lóyia, speak: see -ology.] The sum of scientific knowledge concerning the pulse.

sphygmomanometer (sfīg-mō-mā-nom'e-tēr), n. [< Gr. σφύγμός, pulse, + μανόμετρον, manómētron, + μέτρον, mētron, measure (cf. manometer).] An instrument for measuring the tension of the blood in an artery.

sphygmometer (sfīg-uom'o-tēr), n. [< Gr. σφύγμός, pulse, + μέτρον, mētron, measure.] Same as sphygmomanometer.

sphygmophone (sfīg-mō-fōn), n. [< Gr. σφύγμός, pulse, + φωνή, sound, voice.] An instrument by the aid of which each pulse-beat makes a sound. It is a combination of a kind of sphygmograph with a microphone.

sphygmoscope (sfīg-mō-skōp), n. [< Gr. σφύγμός, pulse, + σκοπεῖν, skopēin, view.] An instrument for rendering the arterial pulsations visible. One form of it works by the projection of a ray of light from a mirror which is moved by the pulsation; in another form the impact of the pulsation is received in a reservoir of liquid, which is caused by it to manifest in a graduated tube. The invention of the instrument is ascribed to Galileo.

sphygmus (sfīg'mus), n. [< Gr. σφύγμός, the beating of the heart, the pulse, + σφίζω, sfízō, beat violently, throb.] The pulse.

sphynx, n. An occasional misspelling of sphinx.

Sphyræna (sfī-rō'nī), n. [< NL. (Artedi, Bloch, etc.), < L. sphyræna, < Gr. σφίρανα, a sea-fish so called, a hammer-fish, < σφίρα, hammer, mallet.] 1. The representative genus of Sphyrænidae. It contains about 20 species of voracious pike-like fishes, of most temperate and tropical seas. S. ret or S. vulgaris is the bignonia, of both coasts of the Atlantic and of the Mediterranean, the sphyræna of the ancients, about 2 feet long, of an olive color, silvery below, when young with dusky blotches. S. argentea of the Pacific coast, abundant from San Francisco southward, about 2 feet long, is an important food-fish. S. plicata, the barracuda of the West Indies, grows to be sometimes 7 or 8 or even, it is claimed, 10 feet long. See cut under becuna. 2. [< L.] A fish of this genus.

Sphyrænidae (sfī-rō'nī-dē), n. pl. [< NL. (Bonaparte, 1831), < Sphyræna + -idae.] A family of perciforme neanthopterygii fishes, typified by the genus Sphyræna. About 20 species are known, all of which are closely related, and usually referred to the single genus Sphyræna. They are mostly inhabitants of the tropical seas; but a few advance northward and southward into cooler waters, as along the United States coast to New England. They are voracious and savage, and the larger ones are much dreaded. See cut under becuna. Also Sphyrænoidei.

sphyrænine (sfī-rō'nīn), a. [< Sphyræna + -ine.] Same as sphyrænoidei.

sphyrænoidei (sfī-rō'nō'idē), a. [< Sphyræna + -oidei.] Of or pertaining to the Sphyrænidae.

Sphyrna (sfēr'nī), n. [< NL. (Rafinesque, 1815), an error for Sphyræna, < Gr. σφίρα, a hammer.] A genus of hammer-headed sharks, giving name to the family Sphyrnidae. It contains those in which the head is most hammer-like, and grooves extend from the nostrils to the front. S. tiburo, the bonnet-shark, is now placed in another genus (Isurus). Sphyrna is an exact synonym of Sphyræna, but is preoccupied in entomology. Also called Cetoracion (after Klein). See cut under hammerhead.

Sphyrnidae (sfēr'nī-dē), n. pl. [< NL., < Sphyrna + -idae.] A family of mnanthous selachians; the hammer-headed sharks, having an extraordinary conformation of the head. There are 3 genera and 5 or 6 species, found in most seas. The body usually has the common shark-like form; but the head is expanded laterally into a kidney-like shape, or arched like a hammer-head. The eyes are upon the sides of the expanded head, and the nostrils are on the front edge. The fins are like those of ordinary sharks. See cuts under hammerhead and shark. Also called Zygænidæ.

sphyrnine (sfēr'nīn), a. [< Sphyrna + -ine.] Of the character or appearance of a hammer-headed shark; belonging to the Sphyrnidae; zygænine.

Sphyrapicus (sfī-rō-pī'kus), n. [< NL. (orig. Sphyrapicus, S. F. Baird, 1858), < Gr. σφίρα, a hammer, + L. picus, a woodpecker.] A remarkable genus of Picidae, having the tongue obtuse, brushy, and scarcely extensible, owing to the shortness of the hyoid bones, whose horns do not curl up over the hindhead; the sapsuckers, or sapsucking woodpeckers. There are several species, all American, feeding upon soft fruits and sapwood, as well as upon insects. The common yellow-bellied woodpecker of the United States is S. varius, of which a variety, S. nuchalis, is found in the west, and another, S. ruber, has the whole head, neck, and breast carmine-red. A very distinct species is S. thyroideus of the western United States, notable for the great difference between the sexes, which long caused them to be regarded as different species, and even placed in different genera. The condition of the hyoid apparatus in this genus is unique, though an approach to it is seen in the genus Xenopicus. See cut under sapsucker.

spialt (spī'nt), n. [Early mod. E. also spyal, spyal; by aphorosis from espial: see espial, and cf. spion, spy.] 1. Close or secret watch; espial.

I have those eyes and ears shall still keep guard And spion on thee. B. Jonson, Catiline, iv. 2.

2. A spy; a watcher; a scout.

Secretaries and spials of princes and states bring in bills for intelligence. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II.

spiauterite (spī-ā'tēr-it), n. [< G. spiauter, spelter (see spelter), + -ite.] Same as warzite.

spica (spī'kī), n. [< L. spica, a point, spike, ear of grain: see spike.] 1. In bot., a spike.

— 2. In surg., a spiral bandage with reversed turns: so named because it was thought to resemble a spiko of barley. — 3. In ornith., a spur; a enlar. — 4. [< cap.] In astron., a very white star of magnitude 1.2, the sixteenth in order of brightness in the heavens, a Virginis, situated on the left hand of the Virgin. — Spica celtica, an old name of Valeriana Celtica. — Spica nard, Same as spikenard.

spical (spī'kāl), a. [< NL. **spicatus*, < L. spica, a spiko: see spike.] Same as spicate: as, the spical palpi of a dipterous insect.

Spicæ (spī-kā'tē), n. pl. [< NL., fem. pl. of L. spicatus, spiked: see spicate.] A section of penatidoid polyps, distinguished by a bilateral arrangement of the polyps on the rachis, which is elongate, cylindrical, and destitute of pinules.

spicate (spī'kāt), a. [< L. spicatus, spiked, pp. of spicare, furnish with spikes, < spica, a spiko: see spike.] 1. In bot., having the form of a spiko; arranged or disposed in spikes. — 2. In ornith., spurred; enclerate; spiciferous.

spicated (spī-kā'ted), a. [< spicate + -ed.] In bot., same as spicate.

spicateous (spī-kā'tē-us), a. [< Irreg. < spicate + -ous.] In zool., spicate; specifically, of or pertaining to the Spicæ.

spicatum (spī-kā'tum), n. [< L., se. opus, lit. 'spicate work': see spicate.] In anc. masonry, herring-bone work: so called from the resemblance of the position of the blocks of any two contiguous courses to that of the grains in an ear of wheat.

For trewth telseth that lone is tracle of henene; May no symo be on him sene that vseth that spice. Piers Plowman (B), l. 147.

3. An exemplification of the kind of thing mentioned; specimen; sample; instance; piece.

Whanne he seeth the lepre in the skyne, and the heers changed into whitt colour, and thilk spice of lepre lower than the skyne and that other lech, in plango of lepre it is. Illyd, Lev. xiii. 3.

He hath spices of them all, not all. Shak., Cor., iv. 7. 40.

4. A characteristic touch or taste; a modicum, smack, or flavoring, as of something piquant or exciting to the mind: as, a spice of roguery or of adventure. [In this sense now regarded as a figurative use of def. 5; compare sauce in a similar figurative use.]

I think I may pronounce of them, as I heard good Senecio, with a spice of the wit of the last age, say, viz., "That a merry fellow is the saddest fellow in the world."

Steele, Tatler, No. 45.

The world loves a spice of wickedness. Longfellow, Hyperion, l. 7.

5. A substance aromatic or pungent to the taste, or to both taste and smell; a drug; a savory or piquant condiment or eatable; a relish. The word in this sense formerly had a much wider range than at present (def. 6); it is still used in northern England as including sweets, gingerbread, cake, and any kind of dried fruit.

"Haslow nyste in thil purs, any hote spices?"

"I haue peper and plones [peony-seeds]," quod she, "and n pounde of garlike, A fertyngworth of fenel-seed for fastyngdayes."

Piers Plowman (B), v. 311.

Now, specifically—6. One of a class of aromatic vegetable condiments used for the seasoning of food, commonly in a pulverized state, as pepper, nutmeg, nutmeg, ginger, cinnamon, and cloves; collectively, such substances as a class: as, the trade in spices or spice.

So was her love diffused; but, like to some odorous spices, Suffered no waste nor loss, though filling the air with aroma. Longfellow, Evangeline, ll. 5.

7. A piquant odor or odorous substance, especially of vegetable origin; a spicy smell. [Poetical.]

The woodbine spices are wafted abroad, And the musk of the rose is blown.

Tennyson, Maud, xxii.

8. Figuratively, a piquant concomitant; an engaging accompaniment or incident; an attractive or enjoyable variation.

Is not birth, . . . youth, liberality, and such like, the spice and salt that season a man?

Shak., T. and C., I. 2. 277.

Variety's the very spice of life, That gives it all its flavour.

Cowper, Task, II. 600.

Madagascar spice, the clove-nutmeg. See Ravensara.

Spice plaster. See plaster. = Syn. 4. Relish, savor, dash.

Spice (spīs), v. t.; pret. and pp. spiced, ppr. spicing. [< ME. spice, < OF. espice, F. épice = Sp. especiar, spice; from the noun.] 1. To prepare with a condiment or seasoning, especially of something aromatic or piquant; season or temper with a spice or spices: as, highly spiced food; to spice wine.

Shulde no curians clothe come on lvs rugge, Se no mete in his mouth that minister Iohan spiced.

Piers Plowman (B), xix. 282.

2. To vary or diversify, as speech, with words or matter of a different kind or tenor; interlard; make spicy, piquant, or entertaining; as, to spice one's talk with oaths, quips, or scandal; to spice a sermon with anecdotes.

Spice (spīs), n. [Perhaps a var. of spike.] A small stick. [Prov. Eng.]

Spice-apple (spīs'ap'pl), n. An aromatic variety of the common apple.

Spice-box (spīs'boks), n. 1. A box to keep spices in; specifically, a cylindrical box inclosing a number of smaller boxes to contain the different kinds of spice used in cooking. — 2. In decorative art, a cylindrical box, low in proportion to its diameter, and having a lid; especially, such a box of Indian or other Oriental work. Spice-boxes are usually of metal, often of gold or silver, and decorated with damascening or otherwise.

Small boxes of very graceful form, covered with the most delicate tracery, and known to Europeans as spice-boxes. G. C. M., Hindwood, Indian Arts, I. 160.

Spice-bush (spīs'bush), n. A North American shrub, Lindera Benzoin, the bark and leaves of which have a spicy odor, bearing small yellow flowers very early in the spring and oval scarlet berries in late summer. See Lindera and fever-bush. Also spicewood.

Spice-cake (spīs'kāk), n. A cake flavored with a spice of some kind, as ginger, nutmeg, or cinnamon.

She's g'en him to eat the good spice-cake, She's g'en him to drink the blood-red wine.

Young Brechan and Susie Pye (Child's Ballads, IV. 5).

A spice-cake, which followed by way of dessert, vanished like a vision. Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, I.

spiced (spist), p. a. [ME. spiced; < spice + -ed.] 1. Impregnated with an aromatic odor; spicy to the smell; spice-laden.

In the spiced Indian air, by night,
Full often hath she gossip'd by my side.
Shak., M. N. D., li. 1. 124.

Spiced carnations of rose and garnet crowned their bed in July and August.

R. T. Cooke, Somebody's Neighbors, p. 39.
2†. Particular as to detail; over-nice in matters of conscience or the like; scrupulous; squeamish.

Ye shold beent al patient and meke,
And han a sweete, spiced conscience,
Sith ye so prebe of Jobes patience,
Chaucer, Prolog. to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 435.

Take it: 'tis yours;
Be not so spiced; 'tis good gold,
And goodness is no gall to the conscience.
Fletcher, Mad Lover, iii. 1.

spiceful (spis'fūl), a. [< spice + -ful.] Spice-laden; spicy; aromatic.

The scorching sky
Doth singe the sandy wilds of spiceful Barbary.
Drayton, Polyolbion, v. 312.

spice-mill (spis'mil), n. A small hand-mill for grinding spice, etc.: sometimes mounted ornamentally for use on tables.

spice-nut (spis'nūt), n. A gingerbread-nut.
spice-plate (spis'plat), n. A particular kind of plate or small dish formerly used for holding spice to be served with wine.

Item, ij. spiceplates, weyng both iijxxij. unces.
Paston Letters, l. 474.

The spice for this mixture [hypocras] was served often separately, in what they called a spice-plate.
T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry (ed. 1871), III. 277, note.

spicer (spis'er), n. [< ME. spicer, spyce, spycere, spysere, < OF. espiere, F. épicer = Pr. espessier = Sp. especiero = Pg. especieiro, < ML. speciarus, a dealer in spices or groceries, < LL. species, spice: see spice.] 1†. A dealer in spices, in the widest sense; a grocer; an apothecary.

Spices spoke with hym to spien here ware,
For he couth of here craft and knewe many gomme.
Piers Plowman (B), ll. 225.

2. One who seasons with spice.
spicery (spis'er-i), n. [< ME. spicerie, spicerie = D. speerij = G. spezerei = Sw. Dan. speeri, < OF. spicerie, espicerie, F. épicerie = Pr. Pg. especiarie = Sp. especieria = It. specieria, < ML. speciarus, spices, < LL. species, spice: see spice.] n. 1. Spices collectively.

Ne how the fyr was couched first with stree [straw], . . .
And thanne with greene woode and spicerie.
Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 2077.

And eke the fayrest Alma mett him there,
With balme, and wine, and costly spicerie,
To comfort him in his infirmity.
Spenser, F. Q., II. xl. 49.

2†. A spicy substance; something used as a spice.

For (ahlas my goode Lorde), were not the cordial of these two pretious Spiceries, the corrosyue of care would quickly confounde me.
Gascoyne, Steele Glas (ed. Arber), Ep. Ded., p. 43.

3. A repository of spices; a grocery or buttery; a store of kitchen supplies in general.

Furst speke with the pantere or offiere of the spicery,
For frutes a-fore mete to ete them fastyngly.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 162.

He had in the hall-kitchen . . . a clerk of his spicery.
G. Cavendish, Cardinal Wolsey, l. 34.

4. A spicy quality or effect; an aromatic effluence; spiciness.

My taste by her sweet lips drawn with delight,
My smelling won with her breath's spicery.
Drayton, Idea, xxix., To the Senses.

The affluence of his [Emerson's] illustrations diffuses a flavor of oriental spicery over his pages.

G. Ripley, in Frothingham, p. 266.

spice-shop (spis'shop), n. [< ME. spice schope; < spice + shop.] A shop for the sale of aromatic substances; formerly, a grocery or an apothecary's shop.

A Spycere schoppe (a Spice schope . . .), apotheca vel lpotheca.
Cath. Ang., p. 355.

spice-tree (spis'trē), n. An evergreen tree, Umbellularia Californica, of the Pacific United States, variously known as mountain-laurel, California laurel, olive, or bay-tree, and cajeput. Northward it grows from 70 to 90 feet high, and affords a hard strong wood susceptible of a beautiful polish; this is used for some ship building purposes, and is the finest cabinet-wood of its region. The leaves are exceedingly ncid, exhalant, when bruised, a pungent effluvia which excites sneezing.

spice-wood (spis'wūd), n. Same as spice-bush.

bear.] 1. In bot., bearing or producing spikes; spicate; eared.—2. In ornith., spurred; having spurs or calcares, as a fowl.

spiciform (spi'si-fōrm), a. [< L. spica, a point, spike, ear, + forma, form.] Having the form of a spike or spike.

spicily (spi'si-li), adv. In a spicy manner; pungently; with a spicy flavor.

spiciness (spi'si-nes), n. The quality of being racy, piquant, or spicy, in any sense.

Delighted with the spiciness of this beautiful young woman.
The Century, XXVI. 370.

spick (spik), n. [An obs. or dial. form of spike; cf. pick as related to pike.] A spike; a tenter. Florio.

spick (spik), n. [Origin obscure.] A titmouse. —Blue spick, the blue titmouse, Parus caeruleus.

spick (spik), n. See spick-and-span-new.

spick-and-span (spik'and-span'), a. [Shortened from spick-and-span-new.] Same as spick-and-span-new.

From our poetic store-house we produce
A couple [of similes] spick and span, for present use.
Garrick, quoted in W. Cooke's Memoirs of S. Foote, l. 107.

The Dutch Boer will not endure over him . . . a spick-and-span Dutch Africaner from the Cape Colony.
Trotlope, South Africa, II. vi.

Beside my hotel rose a big spick-and-span church.
H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 178.

spick-and-span-new (spik'and-span'nū'), a. [Also spick-span-new; lit. 'new as a spike and chip': an emphatic form of span-new: see spike, spoon, new, and cf. span-new, spick-span-new. Cf. also the equiv. D. spick-splinter-nieuw, 'spick-splinter-new', Dan. splinter-ny, Sw. splinter-ny, 'splinter-new', Sw. dial. till splint och span ny, 'splint-and-span-new', G. spalt-neu, 'splinter-new', etc., E. brand-new, etc. A compound of four independent elements, like this, is very rare in E.; the lit. meaning of the nouns spick and span is not now recognized, but the words spick and span are taken together adverbially, qualifying new, with which they form a compound. By omission of new, the phrase spick-and-span is sometimes used with an attributive force.] New and fresh; span-new; brand-new.

'Tis a fashion of the newest edition, spick and span new, without example.
Ford, Lover's Melancholy, li. 1.

Among other Things, Black-Friars will entertain you with a Play spick and span new, and the Cockpit with another.
Howell, Letters, l. iv. 2.

spicket (spik'et), n. An obsolete form of spigot.
spicknel, spignel (spik'nel, spig'nel), n. [Early mod. E. also spicknell, spignell, spknell, spiknel; said to be a corruption of spike-nail, and to be so called in allusion to the shape of its long capillary leaves.] The baldmoney, Meum athamanticum; also, any plant of the related genus Athamanta, which has similar graceful finely dissected foliage.

spick-span-new (spik'spau-nū'), a. Same as spick-and-span-new.

Look at the cloaths on 'er back, thebbe ammost spick-span-new.
Tennyson, Northern Cöblier.

spicose (spi'kōs), a. [< NL. spicosus: see spicous.] In bot., same as spicous.

spicosity (spi-kōs'i-ti), n. [< spicose + -ity.] In bot., the state or condition of being spicous or eared.

spicous (spi'kus), a. [Also spicose; < NL. spicosus, < L. spica, a spike, ear: see spike.] In bot., having spikes or ears; spiked or eared like corn.

spicula (spik'ū-lā), n.; pl. spiculæ (-lā). [NL.: see spicule.] 1. In bot., a diminutive or secondary spike; a spikelet.—2. A small splinter-like body; a spicule.—3. In zool., a spiculo or spiculum. [Rare.]

spicula, n. Plural of spiculum.

spicular (spik'ū-lār), a. [< spicula + -ar.] In zool.: (a) Having the form or character of a spicule; resembling a spicule; dart-like; spiculiform; spiculate. (b) Containing or composed of spicules; spiculose; spiculiferous or spiculigenous: as, a spicular integument; the spicular skeleton of a sponge or radiolarian.—Spicular notation, a notation for logic, invented by Augustus De Morgan (though the name was given by Sir William Hamilton), in which great use is made of marks of parenthesis. The significations of the principal signs are as follows:

X)Y All Xs are Ys.
X.)Y No Xs are Ys.
X(.)Y Everything is either X or Y.
X(X)Y Some Xs compose all the Ys.
X(X)Y Some Xs are not Ys.
X(X)Y Some Xs are Ys.
X(X)Y Some things are neither X nor Y.
X.)Y None of the Xs are certain of the Ys.

spiculate (spik'ū-lāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. spiculated, ppr. spiculating. [< L. spiculatus, pp. of spiculare, sharpen, < spiculum, dim. of spicum, a point: see spike.] To sharpen to a point.

Extend a rail of elm, securely arm'd
With spiculated palings.
W. Mason, English Garden, ii.

spiculate (spik'ū-lāt), a. [< L. spiculatus, pp. of the verb.] 1. In zool., sharp-pointed; spicate.—2. Covered with or divided into fine points. Specifically, in bot.: (a) Covered with pointed fleshy appendages, as a surface. (b) Noting a spike composed of several spikelets crowded together.

spicule (spik'ūl), n. [< L. spiculum, NL. also spicula, f., a little sharp point, dim. of spicum, spica, a point, spike: see spike.] 1. A fine-pointed body resembling a needle: as, ice-spicules.—2. In bot.: (a) A spikelet. (b) One of the small projections or points on the basidia of hymenomycetous fungi which bear the spores. There are usually four to each basidium. See sterigma.—3. In zool., a hard, sharp body like a little spike, straight or curved, rod-like, or branched, or diversiform; a spiculum; a sclere: variously applied, without special reference to size or shape. Specifically—(a) One of the skeletal elements, scleres, or spicula of the protozoans, as radiolarians, either

Spherozoum punctatum.
A, natural size; B, two of the sacs with colored vesicles and spicules which lie in the investing protoplasm, magnified.

calcareous or silicious, coherent or detached. See cuts under Radiolaria and Spherozoum. (b) One of the spines of echinoderms, sometimes of great size, and bristling over the surface of the test, as in sea-urchins, or small, and embedded in the integument, as in holothurians; sometimes of singular shape, like wheels, anchors, etc. See cuts under ancora, Echinometra, Echinus, and Spatangus. (c) In sponges, a spiculum; one of the hard calcareous or silicious bodies, of whatever shape, which enter into the composition of the skeleton; a mineral sclere; a sponge-spicule (which see). Some sponges mostly consist of spicules, as that figured under Euplectella. (d) In some worms and mollusks, a dart-like organ constituting a kind of penis; a spiculum (which see). (e) In entom.: (1) A minute spine or spinous process. (2) The piercing ovipositor of any insect; especially, the lancet-like portion of the sting of a parasitic hymenopter. See Spiculifera.

spicule-sheath (spik'ū-lī'shēth), n. A thin layer of organic substance forming the sheath or investment of a sponge-spicule.

Spiculifera (spik'ū-lī'f'e-rā), n. pl. [NL.: see spiculiferous.] In Westwood's classification of insects, a division of Hymenoptera, in which the abdomen is, in the female, armed with a long plurivalve ovipositor, and the larvae are footless. It contains the Ichneumonids (including braconids), the evanids, the proctotrypids, the chalcids and the cynipids or gall-flies. It thus corresponds to the Pupificera of Latreille, except in excluding the Chrysididae as Tubulifera.
spiculiferous (spik'ū-lī'f'e-rus), a. [< L. spiculum, a spicule, + ferre = E. bear.] In zool., having a spiculum or spicula; spicular or spiculose; specifically, in entom., having a piercing ovipositor; of or pertaining to the Spiculifera. Also spiculigerous.

spiculiform (spik'ū-lī-fōrm), a. [< L. spiculum, a spicule, + forma, form.] In bot. and zool., having the form of a spicule; being of the nature of a spicule.

spiculigenous (spik'ū-līj'e-nus), a. [< L. spiculum, a spicule, + -igenus, producing: see -genous.] Producing spicules; giving origin to spicules; spiculiferous: as, the spiculigenous tissue of a sponge.

spiculigerous (spik'ū-līj'e-rus), a. [< L. spiculum, a spicule, + gerere, carry.] Same as spiculiferous.

spiculose (spik'ū-lōs), a. [< NL. spiculosus: see spiculous.] Same as spiculous.

spiculous (spik'ū-lus), a. [Also spiculose; < NL. spiculosus, < L. spiculum, a spicule: see spicule.] Having spicules; spinulose; spiculose or spiculiferous.

spiculum (spik'ū-lum), n.; pl. spicula (-lū). [NL., < L. spiculum, a little sharp point: see spicule.] In zool., a spicula or spicule. Specifically—(a) In some worms, a chitinous rod developed in the cloaca as a copulatory organ; a kind of penis. (b) In some mollusks as snails, the love-dart, a kind of penis, more fully called spiculum amoris. (c) In insects, the piercing non-poisonous ovipositor of the Spiculifera.

spicy (spi'si), a. [< spice + -y.] 1. Producing spice; abounding with spices.

As . . . off at sea north-east winds blow Savcan odours from the spicy shore
Of Araby the blest'd.
Milton, P. L., iv. 162.

2. Having the qualities of spice; flavored with spice; fragrant; aromatic; as, spicy plants.

The spicy nut-brown ale. Milton, L'Allegro, l. 100.

Under southern skies exalt their sails,
Led by new stars, and borne by spicy gales!
Pope, Windsor Forest, l. 392.

3. Highly flavored; pungent; keen; pointed; racy: as, a spicy letter or debate. [Colloq.]

Your hint about letter-writing for the papers is not a bad one. . . . A political surmise, a spicy bit of scandal, a sensation trial, wound up with a few moral reflections upon how much better we do the same sort of thing at home. Lerer, A Kent in a Cloud, p. 53.

4. Stylish; showy; smart in appearance: as, a spicy garment; to look spicy. [Slang.]

"Bless'd if there isn't Sulpe dismounting at the gate!" he exclaimed joyfully: "there's a drummer holding his nag. What a spicy chestnut it is!"

Whyte Melville, White Rose, l. xiii.

=Syn. 3. Bacy, Spicy. See racy.

spider (spî'dér), n. [An altered form of **spither*, < ME. spithre, dat. spithre, < AS. **spithre*, orig. **spithr*, with formative -ther of the agent, < spinnan, spin: see spin. Cf. spinner<sup>1</sup>, a spider; D. spin = OHG. spinu, MIG. G. spinne, a spider, lit. 'spinner'.] For other E. names, see attractor, cop<sup>2</sup>, lob<sup>1</sup>, top<sup>3</sup>.] 1. An arthropod of the order Araucaria, Araucaria, or Araucaria (the old Linnean genus Araucaria), of the class Arachnida, of which there are many families, hundreds of genera, and thousands of species, found all over the world. Though popularly considered insects, spiders are not true Insecta, since they have eight instead of only six legs, normally seven-jointed, and no wings are developed. They are dimerommatous—that is, have the body divided into two principal regions, the cephalothorax, or head and chest together, and the abdomen, which is generally tumid or globose, whence the name Sphero-gaster. No antennae are developed as such, but there are raptorial organs called palps, which are subchelate—that is, have a distal joint folding down on the next like the blade of a pocket-knife. (See cut under palp.) In those species which are poisonous, the palps are traversed by the duct of a venom-gland. Some spiders are by far the most venomous animals in existence in proportion to their size; that the bite of a spider can be fatal to man (and there are authentic instances of this) implies a venom vastly more powerful than that of the most poisonous snakes. (See kati and Lalrodectus.) Spiders breathe by means of pulmonary sacs, or lung-sacs, nearly always in connection with tracheae or spiracles, whence they are called pulmo-tracheal; these sacs are two or four in number, whence a division of spiders into dipneumonous and tetrapneumonous arachnids. (See Dipneumonous, 2. Tetrapneumonous.) Most spiders belong to the former division. They have usually eight eyes, sometimes six, rarely four, in one genus (Nop) only two. The abdomen is always distinct, ordinarily globose, never segmented, and provided with two or more pairs of spinnerets. (See cut under arachnidium.) The characteristic habit of spiders is to spin webs to catch their prey, or to make a nest for themselves, or for both these purposes. Cobwebs is a fine silky substance secreted by the arachnidium, or arachnidial glands, and conducted by ducts to the several, usually six, arachnidial nannulles, which open on papillae at or near the end of the abdomen, and through which the viscid material is spun out in fine gossamer threads. Gossamer or spider-silk serves not only to construct the webs, but also to let the spider drop speedily from one place to another, to throw a "flying bridge" across an interval, or even to enable some species to "fly"—that is, be buoyed up in the air and wafted a great distance. It has occasionally been woven artificially into a textile fabric, and is a well-known domestic application for staunching blood. (See cut under silk-spider.) Some spiders are sedentary, others vagabond; the former are called orbicularian, reticularian, inbitularian, etc., according to the character of their webs. Spiders move by running in various directions, or by leaping; whence the vagabond species have been described as rectigrade, laterigrade, citigrade, saligrade, etc. They lay numerous eggs, usually inclosed in a case or cocoon. The male is commonly much smaller than the female, and in impregnating the female runs great risk of being devoured. The difference in size is as if the human female should be some 60 or 70 feet tall. (See cut under silk-spider.) Spiders are carnivorous and highly predatory. Some of the largest kinds are able to kill small birds, whence the name bird-spider of some of the great hairy mygalids. (See cut under bird-spider.) A few are aquatic, as the water-spiders of the genus Argyroneta (which see, with cut). Wolf-spiders or tarantulas belong to the family Lycosidae; but the name tarantula is more frequently applied to the Mygalidae (or Theraphosidae). The common garden-spider or diadem-spider of Europe is Epeira diademata; that of the United States is E. copinaria (or riparia). See Araucaria, and cuts under chelicera, cross-spider, pulmonary, and tarantula.

Female of Lalrodectus mactans, enlarged one quarter.
a, under side of abdomen.

My brain, more busy than the labouring spider,
Weaves tedious snares to trap mine enemies.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., ill. l. 330.

2. Some other arachnidian, resembling or mistaken for a spider; a spider-mite. See red-spider.—3. A spider-crab; a sea-spider.—4. A cooking-utensil having legs or feet to keep it from contact with the coals: named from a fancied resemblance to the insect—the ordinary frying-pan is, however, sometimes erroneously termed a spider. (a) A kind of deep frying-pan, commonly with three feet.

Some people like the sound of bubbling in a boiling pot, or the fizzing of a frying-spider.

C. D. Warner, Backlog Studies, p. 10.

Flash was warmed up in the spider.

J. T. Troubridge, Coupon Bonds, p. 113.

(b) A trivet; a low tripod used to support a dial, or the like, in front of a fire.

5. In naut.: (a) A skeleton of radiating spokes, as a rag-wheel. (b) The internal frame or skeleton of a gear-wheel, for instance, on which a cogged rim may be bolted, shrunk, or cast. (c) The solid interior part of a piston, to which the packing is attached, and to whose axis the piston-rod is secured. E. H. Knight.—G. Naut., an iron outrigger to keep a block clear of the ship's side.—Geometrical spider. See geometrie.—Grass-spider, one of many different spiders, as species of Agalena, which spin webs on the grass, such as may be seen spangled with dew in the morning in meadows.—Round-web spider, one of many orbicularian spiders, as species of Epeira (see, also, cut under cross-spider).—Spider couching. See couching, 6.—Trap-door spider. See Cteniza, Mygalidae, trap-door, and cut under Araucaria. (See also bird-spider, crab-spider, diving-spider, garden-spider, house-spider, jumping-spider, sea-spider, silk-spider, water-spider, wolf-spider.)

spider-ant (spî'dér-ant), n. A solitary ant of the family Mutillidae: so called from the spider-like aspect of the females.

spider-band (spî'dér-band), n. Naut., an iron hoop round a mast to which the lower ends of the futtock-shrouds are secured; also, a hoop round a mast provided with belaying-pins. See cut under futtock-shrouds.

spider-bug (spî'dér-bug), n. A long-legged heteropterous insect of the family Emesidae, Lucia longipes, somewhat resembling a spider. See cut under stick-bug. [U. S.]

spider-catcher (spî'dér-kach'ér), n. A bird that catches spiders. Specifically—(a) The wall-creeper, Tichodroma murina. See cut under Tichodroma. (b) pl. The genus Arachnophaga in a broad sense, numerous species of which inhabit the Indo-Malayan region. They are small creeper-like birds with long bills, and belong to the family Neolarini. Also called spider-eaters and spider hunters.

spider-cells (spî'dér-selz), n. pl. Neuroglia cells.

spider-cot (spî'dér-kot), n. Same as spider-tee.

spider-crab (spî'dér-kmb), n. A spider-like crab, or sea-spider, with long slender legs and comparatively small triangular body. The name is given to many such crabs of different families, but especially to the malakids, or crabs of the family Malacostraca, such as Maia spinata, the common spinous spider-crab of Great Britain, and species of Libinia, Inachus, etc. The giant Japanese spider-crab, Macrochira lacumferi, is the largest crustacean. See cuts under Leptopodia, Lithodes, Maia, and Oxyrhyncha.

A Spider-crab (Inachus dorsettensis), male.

spider-diver (spî'dér-dî'vër), n. The little grobe, or dub-click. [Local, British.]

spider-eater (spî'dér-é'tër), n. Same as spider-catcher (b).

I obtained an interesting bird, a green species of Spider-eater. H. O. Forbes, Eastern Archipelago, p. 233.

Content can visit the poor spidered room.

Wofcot (Peter Pindar), p. 39. (Davies.)

spider-flower (spî'dér-flou'ér), n. 1. A plant of the former genus Lasiandra of the Melastomaceae, now included in Tibouchina. The species are elegant hothouse shrubs from Brazil, bearing large purple flowers.—2. A plant of the genus Cleome, especially C. spinosa (C. pun-gens), a native of tropical America, escaped from gardens in the southern United States. The stipules are spinous, the flowers large, rose-purple to white, with long stamens and style, suggesting the name. See cut under Cleome.

spider-fly (spî'dér-flî), n. A parasitic pupiparous dipterous insect, as a bee-louse, bat-louse, bird-louse, bat-fly, sheep-tick, etc. They are of three families, Brachyidae, Nycteribidae, and Hippoboscidae. Some of them, especially the wingless forms, as Nycteribia, closely resemble spiders in superficial appearance. See cut under sheep-tick.

spider-helmet (spî'dér-hel'met), n. A name given to the skeleton head-pieces sometimes worn. See secret, n., 9.

spider-hunter (spî'dér-hun'tër), n. Same as spider-catcher (b).

spider-legs (spî'dér-legz), n. pl. In gilding, irregular fractures sometimes occurring when gold-leaf is fitted over a molding having deep depressions.

spider-line (spî'dér-lîn), n. One of the threads of a spider's web substituted for wires in micrometer-scales intended for delicate astronomical observations.

The transit of the star is observed over spider lines stretched in the field, while a second observer reads the altitude of this star from the divided circle.

The Century, XXXVI. 608.

spider-mite (spî'dér-mît), n. A parasitic mite or acarid of the family Gamasidae.

spider-monkey (spî'dér-mung'ki), n. A tropical American platyrrhine monkey, of the family Cebidae, subfamily Cebinae, and genera Atles and Brachyteles; a kind of sajou or sapajou, likened to a spider by reason of the very long and slim limbs, and long prehensile tail. They are large slender-bodied monkeys of great agility and of arboreal habits, with the thumb absent or imperfect. Brachyteles (or Eriodes) arachnoides is a Brazilian spider-monkey called the miriki. Atles paniscus is the large black spider-monkey, or coloba; A. melanochir is the black-handed spider-monkey; and many more species or varieties of this genus have been named. One of the spider-monkeys, A. vellerosus, is among the most northerly of American monkeys, extending into Mexico to Orizaba and Oajaca. The flesh of some species is used for food, and the pelts have no commercial value. See also cut under Eriodes.

A Spider monkey (Atles paniscus).

spider-net (spî'dér-net), n. Netting by spider-stitch.

spider-orchis (spî'dér-ôr'kis), n. A European orchid, Ophrys arachnifera. It has an erect stem from 9 to 18 inches high, with a few leaves near the base, and a loose spike of few small flowers with broad dull-brown lip and petals so shaped and arranged as somewhat to resemble a spider.

spider-shell (spî'dér-shel), n. The shell of a gastropod of the family Strombidae and genus Pteroceras; a scorpion-shell, having the outer lip expanded into a number of spines. The species inhabit the Indian and tropical Pacific oceans. See cut under scorpion-shell.

spider-stitch (spî'dér-stîch), n. A stitch in darned netting and in guipure, by which open spaces are partly filled with threads carried diagonally and parallel to each other, the effect of several squares together being that of a spider-web.

spider-wasp (spi'dér-wasp), n. Any true wasp of the family Pompilidae, which stores its nest with spiders for its young, as Ceropales rufiventris of North America, which lays its eggs in the mud nests of Agania. See cut under Agania. spider-web (spi'dér-web), n. The web or net spun by a spider; cobweb; gossamer. Also spider-cot.

spider-wheel (spi'dér-hwél), n. In embroidery, any circular pattern or unit of design open and having radiating and concentric lines. Compare cathe-rine-wheel, 4.

spider-work (spi'dér-wérk), n. Lace worked by spider-stitch.

spiderwort (spi'dér-wért), n. 1. A plant of the genus Tradescantia, especially T. Virginica, the common garden species. It is a native of the central and southern United States, and was early introduced into European gardens. The petals are very delicate and ephemeral; in the wild plant they are blue, in cultivation variable in color, often reddish-violet. 2. By extension, any plant of the order Commelinaceae; specifically, Commelina calceolifolia, a blue-flowered plant from Mexico. The name is also given to Lloydia serotina, mountain-spiderwort; to Anthericum (Phalangium) Liliiago, St. Bernard's lily; and to Paradisia (Zackia) Liliiago, St. Bruno's lily—all Old World plants, the last two ornamental.

spidery (spi'dér-i), a. [Spider + -y.] Spider-like. Cotgrave.

spiel, v. and n. An old spelling of spy.

spiegel (spé'gl), n. [Short for spiegel-eisen.] Same as spiegel-eisen.—Spiegel-iron. Same as spiegel-eisen.

spiegel-eisen (spé'gl-i-zén), n. [G., < spiegel (< L. speculum), a mirror, + eisen = E. iron.] A pig-iron containing from eight to fifteen or more per cent. of manganese. Its fracture often presents large well-developed crystalline planes. This alloy, as well as ferromanganese, an iron containing still more manganese than spiegel-eisen, is extensively used in the manufacture of Bessemer steel, and is a necessary adjunct to that process. Also called spiegel-iron.

spiegelerz (spé'gl-érts), n. [G., < spiegel, a mirror, + erz, ore.] Specular ironstone: a variety of hematite.

spier<sup>2</sup>, v. See spier.

spiffy (spif'i), a. [Origin obscure.] Spruce; well-dressed. [Slang, Eng.]

spifficate (spif'i-kát), v. t. pret. and pp. spifficated, pp. spifficating. [Also spifficate, smiffigate; appar. a made word, simulating a L. origin.] 1. To beat severely; confound; dismay. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]-2. To stifle; suffocate; kill. [Slang.]

So out with your whinger nt once,
And scrag Jane while I spifficate Johnny.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 166.

spification (spif-i-ká'shon), n. [spifficate + -ion.] The act of spifficating, or the state of being spifficated; annihilation. [Slang.]

Whose blood he vowed to drink—the Oriental form of threatening spification. R. F. Burton, El-Mednah, I. 204.

Spigelia (spi-jé'li-á), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1737), named after Adrian van der Spiegel (1558-1625), a Belgian physician and professor of anatomy at Padua.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Loganiaceae and tribe Euloganiceae, type of the subtribe Spigeliaceae. It is characterized by flowers commonly disposed in one-sided spikes, the corolla with valvate lobes, a jointed style, and a two-celled ovary becoming in fruit a compressed twin capsule which is circumscissile above the cup-shaped persistent base. There are about 30 species, natives of America and mostly tropical, 5 extending into the United States; of these 2 are confined to Florida, 2 to Texas, and 1, S. Marylandica, the Maryland pinkroot or worm-grass, reaches Pennsylvania and Wisconsin. They are annual or perennial herbs, rarely somewhat shrubby, either smooth, downy, or woolly, bearing opposite feather-veined or rarely oerved leaves, which are connected by a line or transverse membrane or by stipules. The flowers are usually red, yellow, or purplish, and the many-flowered seed and curving spikes are often very handsome. In S. Anthelmia, the Demerara pinkroot, the flowers are white and pink, followed by purple fruit, and the two pairs of upper leaves are crowded in an apparent whorl. See pinkroot.

Spigelian (spi-jé'li-an), a. [Spiegel (see Spigelia) + -ian.] In anat., noting the lobulus Spigelii, one of the lobes of the liver.

spight<sup>2</sup>, n. and r. An obsolete erroneous spelling of spite.

spignel, n. See spicknel.

spignet (spig'not), n. [A corruption of spikenard.] The American spikenard, Aralia racemosa. See spikenard.

spigot (spig'ot), n. [Early mod. E. also spigot, spiggott, spiggotte, spygotte, spygote, < ME. spigot, spygott, spygott, speget; obs. or dial. also spicket, < ME. spykette, spykette; appar. < Ir. Gael. spicoid, a spigot (= W. ysbigod, a spigot, spindle), dim. of Ir. spice = W. ysbig, a spike, < L. spica, spicus, a point, spiko: see spike.] The Celtic forms may be from the E.] A small peg or plug designed to be driven into a gimlet-hole in a cask through which, when open, the contained liquor is drawn off; hence, by extension, any plug fitting into a faucet used for drawing off liquor.

He runs down into the cellar, and takes the Spigott. In the mean time all the Beer runs about the House. Selden, Table-Talk, p. 63.

spigot-joint (spig'ot-joint), n. A pipe-joint made by tapering down the end of one piece and inserting it into a correspondingly widened opening in the end of another piece. Also called faucet-joint. E. H. Knight.

spigot-pot (spig'ot-pot), n. A vessel of earthenware or porcelain with a hole in the side, near the bottom, for the insertion of a spigot.

spigmurel, n. [ML. spigmurellus; origin obscure.] In law, a name formerly given to the sealer of the writs in chancery.

These Bohuns . . . were by inheritance for a good while the king's spigmurels—that is, the sealers of his writs. Holland, tr. of Camden, p. 312.

spike<sup>1</sup> (spik), n. [Early mod. E. also spyke; < ME. spik = leel. spik = Sw. spik, a spike, = Ir. spice = W. ysbig, a spike; cf. Hence spicous, spicose, etc., and ult. spike, spigot, pik, pick, etc., spine, etc.] 1. A sharp point; a pike; a sharp-pointed projection. (a) A long nail or pointed iron inserted in something with the point outward, as in chevaux-de-frise, the top of a wall, gate, or the like, as a defense or to a, dock-spike, used in building docks and piers; b, cut-spike, or large cut nail; c, d, railway-spike, for fastening rails to sleepers; e, barbed spike; f, barbed and forked spike; g, h, types of forked spikes, the points of which spread and become hooked in the timber when driven, thus making them extremely difficult to draw out.

hinder passage. See cut under chevaux-de-frise. (b) A sharp projecting point on the sole of a shoe, to prevent slipping, as on ice or soft wet ground. (c) The central boss of a shield or buckler when prolonged to a sharp point. Such a spike is sometimes a mere pointed umbo and sometimes a square or three-cornered steel blade screwed or bolted into the boss. (d) In zool.: (1) The antler of a young deer, when straight and without snag or tine; a spike-horn. (2) A young mackerel 6 or 7 inches long. (3) A spine, as of some animals. (e) A piece of hardened steel, with a soft point that can be clenched, used to plug up the vent of a cannon in order to render it useless to an enemy.

2. A large nail or pin, generally of iron. The larger forms of spikes, particularly railroad-spikes, are chisel-pointed, and have a head or fang projecting to one side to bite the rail. Spikes are also made split, barbed, grooved, and of other shapes. See cut in preceding column.

3. An ear, as of wheat or other grain.

Bote yf the sed that sowen is in the sloh steruc,
Shall neuere spir springen vp, ne spik on strawe eurne.
Piers Plowman (C), xiii. 180.

4. In bot., a flower-cluster or form of inflorescence in which the flowers are sessile (or apparently so) along an elongated, unbranched common axis, as in the well-known mullein and plantain. There are two modifications of the spike that have received distinct names, although not distinguishable by exact and constant characters. They are spadix and cathin. In the Equisetaceae a spike is an aggregation of sporophylls at the apex of a shoot. Compare raceme, and see cut under inflorescence, barley, papyrus, and Equisetaceae.

Hence—5. A sprig of some plant in which the flowers form a spike or somewhat spike-like cluster: as, a spike of lavender.

The head of Nardus spreadeth into certain spikes or ears, whereby it hath a twofold use, both of spike and also of leaf; in which regard it is so famous.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, xii. 12.

Within, a stag-horned sumach grows,
Fern-leaved, with spikes of red.

Whittier, The Old Burying-Ground.

spike<sup>1</sup> (spik), v. t. pret. and pp. spiked, pp. spiking. [spike, n.] 1. To fasten with spikes or long and large nails: as, to spike down the planks of a floor or a bridge.—2. To set with spikes; furnish with spikes.—3. To fix upon a spike.—4. To make sharp at the end. Johnson.—5. To plug up the vent of with a spike, as a cannon.—Spiked locomotive. See locomotive.

spike<sup>2</sup> (spik), n. [= MD. spijcke, spick, D. spijk, < OF. spicque, F. spic, lavender; cf. NL. Lavandula Spica, spike-lavender; < L. spica, a spike: see spike. Cf. aspic.] Same as spike-lavender.—Oil of spike. See oil of lavender, under lavender.

spikebill (spik'bil), n. 1. A merganser, as the hooded merganser; a sawbill. See cut under merganser. G. Trumbull, 1888. [Michigan.]—2. The great marbled godwit, Limosa fedoa. G. Trumbull, 1888.

[New Jersey.]

spike-extractor (spik'eks-trák'tor), n. An apparatus for extracting spikes, as from a rail.

spike-fish (spik'fish), n. A kind of sailfish, Histiophorus americanus, so called from the long sharp snout. See Histiophorus, and cut under sailfish.

spike-grass (spik'grás), n. One of several American grasses, having conspicuous flower-spikelets. (a) Diplachne fascicularis. (b) Distichlis maritima (salt-grass). (c) The genus Uniola, especially U. paniculata (also called sea or scaride oats), a tall coarse grass with a dense heavy panicle, growing on sand-hills along the Atlantic coast southward.

spikehorn (spik'hörn), n. 1. The spike of a young deer.—2. A young male deer, when the antler is a mere spike.

spike-lavender (spik'lav'en-dér), n. A lavender-plant, Lavandula Spica. See aspic, and oil of lavender (under lavender).

spikelet (spik'let), n. [spike + -let.] In bot., a small or secondary spike: more especially applied to the spiked arrangements of two or more flowers of grasses, subtended by one or more glumes, and variously disposed around a common axis. See cut under Meliceae, oat, orchard-grass, Poa, reed, 1, rye, and Sorghum.

spike-nail (spik'nál), n. A spike.

spikenard (spik'nárd), n. [spike, n. + nard, < OF. spicunard, spikunard, spikanard, < OF. spicunard (also simply espie, spic) = Sp. espicanardi, Spike-extractor.

a, rail; b, spike to be extracted; c, fulcrum-piece hooked over the rail and supported on the sleeper; d, claw-lever, with a heel shown in dotted outline, which is passed through a slot in the fulcrum-piece.

espica nardo = Pg. spicanardo, espicanardo = It. spiganardo, formerly spigo nardo, = MD. spijk-nard = MHG. spicanarde, nardespicke, G. spikenard, < L. spica nardi, 'a spike of nard' (ML. also nardus spicatus, 'spiked nard'): L. spica, spike; nardi, gen. of nardus, nard: see spike and nard.] 1. A plant, the source of a famous perfumed unguent of the ancients, now believed to be Nardostachys jatamansi, closely allied to valeriana, found in the Himalayan region. This plant is known to have been used by the Hindus as a medicine and perfume from a very remote period, and is at present employed chiefly in hair-washes and ointments. The odor is heavy and peculiar, described as resembling that of a mixture of valerian and patchouli. The market drug consists of short pieces of the rootstock densely covered with fibers, the remains of leafstalks. Also nard.

Spikenard (Nardostachys jatamansi).

2. An aromatic ointment of ancient times, in which spikenard was the characteristic ingredient; nard. It was extremely costly.

There came a woman having an alabaster box of ointment of spikenard, very precious, and she brake the box, and poured it on his head. Mark xiv. 3.

3. A name given to various fragrant essential oils.—American spikenard, a much-branched herbaceous plant, Aralia racemosa, with a short thick rootstock more spicy than that of A. nudicaulis, the wild sassa-parilla, and, like that, used in domestic medicine in place of true sassa-parilla. The A. nudicaulis is sometimes named small spikenard, while A. racemosa, the angelica-tree, has been called spikenard-tree.—Celtic spikenard, Valeriana Phu, an Asiatic plant, sometimes cultivated in Europe, but medicinally weaker than the official valerian.—False spikenard, an American plant, Smitacina racemosa, somewhat resembling the true (American) spikenard. Also false Solomon's-seal.—Indian spikenard, the true spikenard. See def. 1.—Pewman's spikenard, a European plant, Inda Conyza, so called from its fragrant root and from being confounded with a plant by some writers called nardus rustica or clown's-nard. Prior.—Small spikenard. See American spikenard.—West Indian spikenard, a fragrant weed, Hyptis suaveolens, sometimes cultivated for medicinal use.

spikenard-tree (spik'nård trē), n. See American spikenard, under spikenard.

spikenelt, n. An obsolete form of spicknel, spick-nel.

spikenose (spik'nōz), n. The pike-perch, or wall-eyed pike, Stizostedion vitreum. See cut under pike-perch. [Lake Ontario.]

spike-oil (spik'oil), n. [= D. spijkolie; as spike + oil.] The oil of spike. See spike, lavender 2.

—Spike-oil plant, Lavandula spica. See lavender 2.

spike-plank (spik'plangk), n. Naut., a platform or bridge projecting across a vessel before the mizzenmast, to enable the ice-master to cross over and see ahead, and so pilot her clear of the ice: used in arctic voyages. Admiral Smyth.

spiker (spik'kēr), n. In rail-laying, a workman who drives the spikes.

spike-rush (spik'rush), n. See Eleocharis.

spike-shell (spik'shel), n. A pteropod of the genus Styliola.

spike-tackle (spik'tak'l), n. A tackle serving to hold a whale's carcass alongside the ship during flensing.

spiketail (spik'tāl), n. Same as pintail, 1. [Illinois.]

spike-tailed (spik'tāld), a. Having a spiked tail.—Spike-tailed grouse, the sharp-tailed, sprig-tailed, or pin-tailed grouse, Pediacetes phasianellus or columbianus. See cut under Pediacetes.

spike-team (spik'tōm), n. A team consisting of three horses or other draft-animals, two of which are at the pole while the third leads.

spiky (spik'ki), a. [< spike + -y.] 1. Having the shape of a spike; having a sharp point or points; spike-like. [Rare.]

Ranks of spiky maize
Rose like a host embattled.
Bryant, The Fountain.

2. Set with spikes; covered with spikes.

The spiky wheels through heaps of carnage tore.
Pope, Iliad, xx. 585.

spilt, n. An obsolete form of spill 2.

Spilanthes (spi-lan'thēz), n. [NL. (Jacquin, 1763), said to be so called in allusion to the brown disk surrounded by yellow rays in the original species; < Gr. σπιλος, spot, + ανθος, flower.] A genus of composite plants, of the tribe Helianthoidæ and subtribe Verbesinæ.

It is characterized by stalked and finally ovoid-conical heads with small flowers; the ray-flowers are fertile or absent; the style-branches are truncate and without the appendages common among related genera; the achenes are small, compressed, commonly ciliate, and without pappus, or bearing two or three very slender bristles. Over 40 species have been described, of which perhaps 20 are distinct. They are mainly natives of eastern and tropical America, with some species common in warmer parts of both hemispheres. Most of the species are much-branched annuals, smooth or slightly downy, bearing toothed opposite leaves, and long-stalked solitary heads with a yellow disk and yellow or white rays. S. acmella, of the East Indies, has been called alphabet-plant. Its variety oleracea is the Para cress. Another species, S. repens, occurs in the southern United States.

spile 1 (spil), n. [< D. spijl, a spile, bar, spar, = LG. spilc, a bar, stake, club, bean-pole (> G. spile (obs.), spiler, a skewer); perhaps in part another form of D. spil, a pivot, axis, spindle, capstan, etc., a contracted form, = E. spindle: see spindle. Cf. spill 2, spelt.] The Ir. spile, a wedge, is from E.] 1. A solid wooden plug used as a spigot. 2. A wooden or metal spout driven into a sugar-maple tree to conduct the sap or sugar-water to a pan or bucket placed beneath it; a tapping-gauge. [U. S.]-3. In ship-building, a small wooden pin used as a plug for a nail-hole. 4. A narrow-pointed wedge used in tubbing. 5. A pile: same as pile 1, 3.

spile 1 (spil), v. t.; pret. and pp. spiled, ppr. spiling. [< spile, n.] 1. To pierce with a small hole and stop the same with a plug, spigot, or the like: said of a cask of liquid.

I had them [casks] spiled underneath, and, constantly running off the wine from them, filled them up afresh.
Marryat, Pacha of many Tales, Greek Slave.

2. To set with piles or piling.

spile 2, v. [ME. spilen, < Icel. spila = G. spiclen, play, = AS. spelian, take a part: see spelt 3.] To play.

spile 3 (spil), n. 'A dialectal form of spoil.
spile-borer (spil'bōr'ēr), n. A form of auger-bit for boring out stuff for spiles or spigots. It tapers the ends of the spiles by means of an obliquely set knife on the slank. E. H. Knight.

spile-hole (spil'hōl), n. A small aperture made in a cask, usually near the bung-hole, for the admission of air, to cause the liquor to flow freely.

spilikin, n. See spillikin.

spilling (spil'ling), n. [Verbal n. of spile 1, v.]

spillway (spil'wā), n. A passage for surplus water from a dam.

In wet weather the water in the two reservoirs flows away through the spillways or waste wells beside the dams, and runs down the river into Croton Lake.

The Century, XXXIX. 207.

Spilochalcis (spi-lô-kal'sis), n. [NL. (Thomson, 1875), < Gr. σπίλος, a spot, speck, + NL. Chalcis; see Chalcis<sup>1</sup>.] A genus of parasitic hymenopterous insects, of the family Chalcididae, containing some of the largest species. The hind thighs are greatly enlarged, the abdomen has a long petiole, the thorax is maculate, and the middle tibiae have spurs. The genus is very widely distributed, and the species destroy many kinds of insects. Some of the smaller ones are secondary parasites. S. mariae is a common parasite of the large native American silkworms, such as the polyphemus and cecropia.

Spilogale (spi-log'a-lô), n. [NL., < Gr. σπίλος, a spot, + γαλή, contr. of γαλέν, a weasel.] A genus of American skunks, differing from Mephitis in certain cranial characters. The skull is depressed, with highly arched zygomatic, well-developed postorbital and slight mastoid processes, and peculiarly bullous periotic region. S. putorius, formerly Mephitis bicolor, is the little striped or spotted skunk of the United States. It is black or blackish, with numerous white stripes and spots in endless diversity of detail. The length is scarcely 12 inches without the tail, which is shorter than the rest of the animal. The genus was named by J. E. Gray in 1865. See cut in next column.

Little Striped Skunk (Spilogale putorius).

Spilornis (spi-lôr'nis), n. [NL. (G. R. Gray, 1840), < Gr. σπίλος, a spot, + ὄρνις, a bird.] A genus of large spotted and crested hawks, of the family Falconidae, having the tarsi bare below, the nostrils oval and perpendicular, and the crest-feathers rounded. There are several species of India, and thence through the Indo-Malayan region to Celebes and the Sulu and Philippine Islands. The best-known is the cheela, S. cheela, of India. The bache, S. bache, inhabits Java, Sumatra, and Malacca; S. pallidus is found in Borneo, S. rufipennis in Celebes, S. vitiensis in the Sulu Islands, and S. holospilus in the Philippines.

Crested Serpent-eagle, or Cheela (Spilornis cheela).

spilosite (spi-lô-sit), n. [Irreg. < Gr. σπίλος, a spot, + -ite<sup>2</sup>.] A name given by Zincken to a rock occurring in the Harz, near the borders of the granitic mass of the Ramberg, apparently the result of contact metamorphism of the slate in the vicinity of granite or diabasite. The most prominent visible feature of this change in the slate is the occurrence of spots; hence the rock has been called by the Germans Fleckenschiefer, while rocks of a similar origin, but striped instead of spotted, are known as Handschiefer. Similar phenomena of contact metamorphism have been observed in other regions and described by various authors, and such altered slates are called by English geologists spotted schists, chistolite schists, and andalusite schists, etc.

Spilotes (spi-lô-têz), n. [NL. (Wagler, 1830), as if < Gr. σπίλος, a spot, stain, < σπίλος, a spot.] A genus of colubrine serpents, having smooth equal teeth, one median dorsal row of scales, internasals not confluent with nasals, two prefrontals, two nasals, one preocular, the rostral not produced, and the anal scale entire. S. couperi is a large harmless snake of the South Atlantic and Gulf States, sometimes 6 or 8 feet long, of a black color shading into yellow below, and known as the indigo or gopher-snake. This genus was called Georgia by Baird and Girard in 1853.

spilth (spilth), n. [C. spill<sup>1</sup> + -th<sup>3</sup>. Cf. tillth.] That which is spilled; that which is poured out lavishly.

Our vaults have wept
With drunken spilth of wine.

Shak., T. of A., II. 2. 169.

Burned like a spilth of light
Out of the crashing of a myriad stars.

Drowning, Sordello.

spilus (spi'lus), n. [NL., < Gr. σπίλος, a spot, blemish.] 1. Pl. spili (-li). In anat. and pathol., a spot or discoloration; a nevus or birthmark.—2. [cap.] In entom., a genus of elaterid beetles, confined to South America. Candèze, 1859.

spin (spin), v.; pret. spun (formerly also span), pp. spun, ppr. spinning. [ME. spinnen, spynnen (pret. span, pl. spoune, pp. spounnen), < AS. spinnan (pret. spann, pp. spunnen) = D. spinnen = MLG. LG. spinnen = OHG. spinnan, MHG. G. spinnen = Icel. Sw. spinna = Dan. spinde = Goth. spinnan, spin; prob. related to span (AS. spannan, etc.), < Teut. √ span, draw out: see span<sup>1</sup>. Hence ult. spinner, spindle, spinster, spider.] I. trans. 1. To draw out and twist into threads, either by the hand or by machinery: as, to spin wool, cotton, or flax.

All the yarn she [Penelope] spun in Ulysses' absence did but fill Ithaca full of moths. Shak., Cor., I. 3. 93.

For plain truths lose much of their weight when they are rarely'd into subtillies, and their strength is impaired when they are spun into too fine a thread.

Stillingsfleet, Sermons, I. iv.

The number of strands of gut spun into a cord varies with the thickness of catgut required.

Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 320.

Dan. spinat = Sw. spenat, spinat, *< ML. *spinatum*, spinach; (d) Pg. espinafre, spinach (cf. L. spinifer, spine-bearing); so called with ref. to the prickly fruit; variously formed, with some confusions, < L. spina, a thorn: see spine.] 1. A chonopodiaceous garden vegetable of the genus Spinacia, producing thick succulent leaves, which, when boiled and seasoned, form a pleasant and wholesome, though not highly flavored dish. There is commonly said to be but a single species, S. oleracea; but S. glabra, usually regarded as a variety, is now recognized as distinct, while there are two other wild species. The leaves of S. oleracea are sagittate, undivided, and prickly; those of S. glabra are larger, rounded at the base, and smooth. These are respectively the prickly-leaved and round-leaved spinach. There are several cultivated varieties of each, one of which, with wrinkled leaves like a Savoy cabbage, is the Savoy or lettuce-leaved spinach. All the species are Asiatic; the cultivated plant was first introduced into Europe by the Arabs by way of Spain.

2. One of several other plants affording a dish like spinach. See phrases below.—Australian spinach, a species of goosefoot, Chenopodium auricomum, a recent substitute for spinach; also, Tetragonia implexicoma, the Victorian bower-spinach, a trailing and climbing plant festooning bushes, its leaves covered with transparent vesicles as in the ice-plant.—Indian spinach. Same as Malabar nightshade. See nightshade.—Mountain spinach. See mountain-spinach.—New Zealand spinach, a decumbent or prostrate plant, Tetragonia expansa, found in New Zealand, Australia, and Tasmania, and also in Japan and southern South America. It has numerous rhom-boid thick and succulent deep-green leaves.—Strawberry spinach. Same as strawberry-Nite.—Wild spinach, a name of several plants locally used as pot-herbs, namely Chenopodium Bonus-Henricus and C. album, Beta maritima (the wild beet), and Campanula latifolia. [Prov. Eng.]

Spinacia (spī-nā'si-ā), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1817), < L. spina, a thorn, prickle, spine: see spine, and cf. spinach.] In ichth., a genus of marine gasterosteids. S. vulgaris is the common sea-stickleback of northern Europe.

Spinacia (spī-nā'si-ā), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < ML. spinacia, spinach: see spinach.] A genus of apetalous plants, of the order Chenopodiaceae and tribo Atriplicaceae. It is characterized by bractless and commonly dioecious flowers, the pistillate with a two- to four-toothed roundish perianth, its tube hardened and closed in fruit, covering the utricle and its single erect turgid seed. There are 4 species, all Oriental (for which see spinach). They are erect annuals, with alternate stalked leaves which are entire or sinuately toothed. The flowers are borne in glomerules, the fertile usually axillary, the staminate forming interrupted spikes.

Spinacidae (spī-nās'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spinax (-ac-) + -idae.] A family of anarthrous sharks, typified by the genus Spinax; the dogfishes. There are 6 or more genera and about 20 species of rather small sharks, chiefly of the Atlantic. Also called Acanthiidae, Centrinidae, and Spinacae.

spinacine (spī'nā-sin), a. [< Spinax (-ac-) + -ine.] Of or pertaining to the Spinacidae.

spinacoid (spī'nā-koid), a. and n. [< Spinax (-ac-) + -oid.] 1. A. Resembling or related to the dogfish; or of pertaining to the Spinacidae.

II. n. A member of the Spinacidae; a dogfish.

spinage, n. See spinach.

spinal (spī'nāl), a. [= F. spinal = Sp. espinal = Pg. espinal = It. spinale, < LL. spinalis, of or pertaining to a thorn or the spine, < L. spina, a thorn, prickle, spine, the spine or backbone: see spine.] In anat.: (a) Of or pertaining to the backbone, spine, or spinal column; rachidian; vertebral: as, spinal arteries, bones, muscles, nerves; spinal curvature; a spinal complaint. (b) Pertaining to a spine or spinous process of bone; spinous: as, the spinal point (the base of the nasal spine, or subnasal point): specifically used in craniometry. [Rare.]—Accessory spinal nerve, or spinal accessory. Same as accessorius (b).—Acute, atrophic and spastic spinal paralysis. See paralysis.—Spinal arteries, numerous branches, especially of the vertebral artery, which supply the spinal cord.—Spinal bulb, the medulla oblongata.—Spinal canal. See canal.—Spinal column, the spine or backbone; the vertebral column or series of vertebrae, extending from the head to the end of the tail, forming the morphological axis of the body of every vertebrate. In man the bones composing the spinal column are normally thirty-three—seven cervical, twelve dorsal or thoracic, five lumbar, five sacral, and four coccygeal. These form a flexuous and sacral. Twenty-four of its bones are individually movable. The total length averages 26 or 27 inches. See vertebra, and cut under backbone.—Spinal cord, the main neural axis of every vertebrate, exclusive of the brain; the myelon, or the neuron without the encephalon; the spinal marrow, or nervous cord which extends in the spinal canal from the brain for a varying distance in different animals, and gives off the series of spinal nerves in pairs. The cord is directly continuous with the brain in all cranial vertebrates, and, with the brain, constitutes the neuron, or cerebrospinal axis, developed from an involution of epiblast in connection with a notochord (see notochord under protobranchia). The cord is primitively tubular, and may retain, in the adult, traces of its ecdysis (see rhombocelia), comparable to the ecdysis of the brain; but it generally solidifies, and also becomes fluted, or presents several parallel columns, from between certain of which the spinal nerves emerge. In man the cord is solid and subeylindrical, and extends in the spinal canal from the foramen magnum, where it is continuous with the oblongata, to the first or second lumbar vertebra. It gives off the spinal nerves, and may be regarded as made up of a series of segments, from each of which springs a pair of nerves; it is divided into cervical, thoracic, lumbar, sacral, and coccygeal regions, corresponding to the nerves and not to the adjacent vertebrae. There is an enlargement where the nerves from the arms come in (the cervical enlargement), and one where those from the legs come in (the lumbar enlargement). A cross-section of the cord exhibits a central H-shaped column of gray substance incased in white. (See figure.) The tracts of different functions are exhibited on one side of the cut; they are not distinguished in the adult healthy cord, but differ from one another in certain periods of early development, and may be marked out by secondary degenerations. The cord is a center for certain reflex actions, and a collection of pathways to and from the brain. The reflex centers have been located as follows: scapular, 5 C. to 1 Th.; epigastric, 4 Th. to 7 Th.; abdominal, 8 Th. to 1 L.; eremasterie, 1 L. to 3 L.; patellar, 2 L. to 4 L.; cystic and sexual, 2 L. to 4 L.; rectal, 4 L. to 2 S.; gluteal, 4 L. to 5 L.; Achilles tendon, 5 L. to 1 S.; plantar, 1 S. to 3 S. See also cuts under brain, cell, Petromyzontidae, and Pharyngobranchii.—Spinal epilepsy, muscle-clonus, spontaneous or due to assuming some ordinary position of the legs, the result of increased myotatic irritability, as in spastic paralysis.—Spinal foramina, the intervertebral foramina.—Spinal ganglia. See ganglion.—Spinal marrow. Same as spinal cord.—Spinal muscles, the muscles proper of the spinal column, which lie longitudinally along the vertebrae, especially the epaxial muscles of the back, constituting what are known in human anatomy as the third, fourth, and fifth layers of muscles of the back (the so-called first and second "layers" of human anatomy being not axial, but appendicular). One of these is called spinialis.—Spinal nerves, the numerous pairs of nerves which arise from the spinal cord and emerge from the intervertebral foramina. In the higher vertebrates spinal nerves originate by two roots from opposite sides of that section of the spinal cord to which they respectively pertain—a posterior, sensory, or ganglionated root, and an anterior, motor, or non-ganglionated root, which usually unite in one sensorimotor trunk before emergence from the intervertebral foramina, and then as a rule divide into two main trunks, one epaxial and the other hypaxial. The number of spinal nerves varies within wide limits, and bears no fixed relation to the length of the spinal cord, which latter may end high in the dorsal region, yet give off a leash of nerves (see cauda equina, under cauda) which emerge from successive intervertebral foramina as far as the coccygeal region. The spinal nerves form numerous and intricate connections with the nerves of the ganglionic system. Their epaxial trunks are always few and small in comparison with the size, number, and extent of the ramifications of the hypaxial trunks, which latter usually supply all the appendicular and most of the axial parts of the body.—Spinal reflexes. See reflex.—Spinal veins, the numerous veins and venous plexuses in and on the spinal column, carrying off blood from the bones and included structures. In man these veins are grouped and named in four sets. See vena.

spinialis (spī-nā'lis), n.; pl. spiniales (lēz). [NL. (sc. musculus), < LL. spinalis, pertaining to a thorn: see spinal.] In anat., a series of muscular slips, derived from the longissimus dorsi, which pass between and connect the spinous processes of vertebrae: usually divided into the spinialis dorsi and spinialis colli, according to its relation with the back and the neck respectively.

spinate (spī'nāt), a. [< NL. spinatus, < L. spina, spine: see spine. Cf. spinach (d).] Covered with spines or spine-like processes.

Spinax (spī'naks), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1817), < Gr. σπιν or σπιν, a fish so called.] A genus of dogfishes, giving name to the family Spinacidae, and represented by S. niger or spinax, a small black shark of Europe.

Spindalis (spin'da-lis), n. [NL. (Jardine and Selby, 1836); origin unknown.] A genus of thick-billed tanagers, of the family Tauagridae, peculiar to the Antillean region. They have a comparatively long bill, ascending goaws, and swollen upper mandible; in the male the coloration is brilliant orange varied with black and white. There are 6 species, S. nigricapilla, portoricensis, multicolor, pretii, benedicti, and zeta, respectively inhabiting Jamaica, Porto Rico, San Domingo, Cuba, Cozumel Island (off the Yucatan coast), and the Bahamas. The first-named builds a cup-shaped nest in trees or shrubs, and lays spotted eggs, and the others are probably similar in this respect. See cut under cashebird.

spindle (spin'dl), n. [Also dial. spinnel; < ME. spindlic, spyndlic, spyndel, spyndelle, spyndyl, spyndylle, < AS. spindlic, spindlic, earlier spinel, spini, spini (dat. spinele, spinele) (= MD. spille (by assimilation for **spinele*), D. spil = OHG. spinnela, spinnila, spinnala, MHG. spinnela, spinnel, G. spindel (also spille, < D.) = Sw. Dan. spindel, a spindle, < spinnan, spin: see spin. Cf. spill.] 1. (a) In hand-spinning, a small bar, usually of wood, hung to the end of the thread as it is first drawn from the mass of fiber on the distaff. By rotating the spindle, the spinner twists the thread, and as the thread is spun it is wound upon the spindle.

Sing to those that hold the vital shears,
And turn the adamant spindle round,
On which the fate of gods and men is wound.
Milton, Areopagus, l. 64.

(b) The pin which is used in spinning-wheels for twisting the thread, and on which the thread, when twisted, is wound. See cut under spinning-wheel. (c) One of the skewers or axes of a spinning-machine upon which a bobbin is placed to wind the yarn as it is spun. See cut under spinning-jenny.—2. Any slender pointed rod or pin which turns round, or on which anything turns. (a) A small axle or axis, in contradistinction to a shaft or large axle, as the arbor or mandrel in a lathe; as, the spindle of a vane; the spindle of the fusce of a watch. See dead-spindle, live-spindle. (b) A vertical shaft supporting the upper stone or runner of a mill in a flour-mill. See cut under mill-spindle. (c) In vehicles, the tapering end or arm on the end of an axle-tree. (d) A small shaft which passes through a door-lock, and upon which the knobs or handles are fitted. When it is turned it withdraws the latch. (e) In ship-building: (1) The upper main piece of a main mast. (2) An iron axle fitted into a block of wood, which is fixed securely between two of the ship's beams, and upon which the capstan turns. (f) In founding, the pin on which the pattern of a mold is formed. (g) In building, same as needle. (h) In cabinet-making, a short turned part, especially the turned or circular part of a baluster, stair-rail, etc.

3. Something having the form of a spindle (sense 1); a fusiform object. (a) The grip of a sword. (b) A pine-needle or leaf. [U. S.]

We went into camp in a magnificent grove of pines. The roots of the trees are buried in the spindles and burrs which have fallen undisturbed for centuries.

G. W. Nichols, Story of the Great March, xxxi.
(c) The roll of not yet unfolded leaves on a growing plant of Indian corn.

Its [the spindle-worm's] ravages generally begin white the cornstalk is young, and before the spindle rises much above the tuft of leaves in which it is enbosomed.

Harris, Insects Injurious to Vegetation.

(d) In conch., a spindle-shell. (e) In anat., a fusiform part or organ. (1) A spindle-cell. (2) The inner segment of a rod or cone of the bacillary layer of the retina. See cut under retina. Huxley, Crayfish, p. 121. (f) In embryol., one of the fusiform figures produced by chromatin fibers in the process of karyokinesis. Amer. Nat., XXII, 933.

4. In geom., a solid generated by the revolution of the arc of a curve-line about its chord, in opposition to a conoid, which is a solid generated by the revolution of a curve about its axis. The spindle is denominated circular, elliptic, hyperbolic, or parabolic, according to the figure of its generating curve. 5. A measure of yarn: in cotton a spindle of 18 hanks is 15,120 yards; in linen a spindle of 48 cuts is 14,400 yards.—6. A long slender stalk.

The spindles must be tied up, and, as they grow in height, rods set by them, lest by their bending they should break.

Mortimer.

7. Something very thin and slender.

I am fall'n away to nothing, to a spindle.
Fletcher, Women Pleased, iv. 3.

Ring-spindle, a spindle which carries a travelling ring.—Spindle side of the house, the female side. See spindle.

spindle (spin'dl), v. i.; pret. and pp. spindled, ppr. spindling. [< spindlic, n.] To shoot or grow in a long, slender stalk or body.

When the flowers begin to spindle, all but one or two of the biggest at each root should be nipped off. Mortimer.

spindle-cataract (spin'dl-kat'ra-kt), n. A form of cataract characterized by a spindle-shaped opacity extending from the posterior surface of the anterior part of the capsule to the anterior surface of the posterior part of the capsule, with a central dilatation. Commonly called fusiform cataract.

spindle-cell (spin'dl-sel), n. A spindle-shaped cell; a fusiform cell.—spindle-cell layer, the deepest layer of the cerebral cortex, containing many fusiform cells with a few angular cells.—spindle-cell sarcoma. See spindle-celled sarcoma, under sarcoma.

spindle-celled (spin'dl-seld), a. Made up of or containing spindle-shaped cells.—spindle-celled sarcoma. See sarcoma.

spindle-legged (spin'dl-legd), a. Having long, thin legs; spindle-shanked.

A pale, sickly, spindle-legged generation of valetudinarians. Addison, Tatler, No. 148.

spindle-legs (spin'dl-legz), n. pl. Long, slim legs; hence, a tall, thin person with such legs or shanks: used humorously or in contempt.

spindle-shanked (spin'dl-shangk), a. Same as spindle-legged.

spindle-shanks (spin'dl-shangkz), n. pl. Same as spindle-legs.

A Weazel-faced cross old Gentleman with Spindle-Shanks. Steele, Tender Husband, i. 1.

spindle-shaped (spin'dl-shäpt), a. Circular in cross-section and tapering from the middle to each end; fusiform; formed like a spindle.

spindle-shell (spin'dl-shel), n. In conch., a spindle-shaped shell; a spindle. (a) A shell of the genus Fusus in some of its applications, as F. antiquus, the common spindle or red-wheel, also called buckie or roaring buckie. See cuts under Fusus and Siphonostoma, 2. (b) A spindle-stromb.

(c) A gastropod of the family Muricidae and genus Chrysodomus, having a spindle-like or fusiform shape and the canal slightly produced. The species inhabit chiefly the northern cold seas. See cut under reverser.

spindle-step (spia'dl-step), n. In mill- and spinning-spindles, the lower bearing of an upright spindle. E. H. Knight.

spindle-stromb (spin'dl-stromb), n. A gastropod of the family Strombidae and genus Rostellaria, having a spindle-like or fusiform shell with a long spire, and also a long anterior canal. The species inhabit the tropical Pacific and Indian oceans. See cut under Rostellaria.

spindletail (spin'dl-tül), n. The pin-tailed duck, Dasia acuta. See pin-tail, 1. [Local, U. S.]

spindle-tree (spin'dl-trē), n. A European shrub or small tree, Euonymus Europæa (E. vulgaris), growing in hedge-rows, on borders of woods, etc. It is so called from the use of its hard fine-grained wood in making spindles, and other uses have given it the names prick-timber, skewer-wood, and pegwood. It is one of the dogwoods. The name is carried over to the American E. atropurpurea, the wahoo or burning-bush, and to the Japanese E. japonica; it is also extended to the genus, and even to the order (Celastraceæ).

spindle-valve (spia'dl-valv), n. A valve having an axial guide-stem. E. H. Knight.

spindle-whorl (spin'dl-hwërl), n. See whorl.

spindle-worm (spin'dl-wërm), n. The larva of the noctuid moth Achatodes (or Gortyna) zeæ; so called because it burrows into the spindle of Indian corn. See spindle, n., 3 (c). [Local, U. S.]

spindling (spind'ling), a. and n. [< spindlic + -ing<sup>2</sup>.] 1. a. Long and slender; disproportionately slim or spindle-like.

II. n. A spindling or disproportionately long and slim person or thing; a slender shoot. [Rare.]

Half-conscious of the garden-squirrel,
The spindlings look unhappy. Tennyson, Amphion.

spindly (spind'li), a. [< spindlic + -y<sup>1</sup>.] Spindle-like; disproportionately long and slender or slim. [Colloq.]

The effect of all this may be easily imagined—n spindly growth of rootless ideas. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXVI, 556.

spindrift (spin'drift), n. [A var. (simulating spin, go rapidly) of spoon-drift, q. v.] Naut., the spray of salt water blown along the surface of the sea in heavy winds.

spine (spin), n. [< OF. espine, F. épine = Pr. Sp. espina = Pg. espinha = It. spina, < L. spina, a thorn, prickle, also the backbone; prob. for **spinea*, and akin to spica, a point, spike; see spike.] In the sense of 'backbone' spine is directly < L. spina. Hence spinach, spinage, spinal, spiny, spinnet, spinney, etc.] 1. In bot., a stiff sharp-pointed process, containing more or less woody tissue, and originating in the degeneration or modification of some organ. Usually it is a branch or the termination of a stem or branch, indurated, leafless, and attenuated to a point, as in the hawthorn, sloe, pear, and honey-loose; its nature is clearly manifest by the axillary position, and also by the fact that it sometimes produces imperfect leaves and buds. A spine may also consist of a modified leaf (all gradations being found between merely spiny-toothed leaves and leaves which are completely contracted into simple or multiple spines, as in the barberry), or of a persistent petiole, as in some Astragal and in Fouquieria, or of a modified stipule, as in the common locust. A spine is to be clearly distinguished from a prickle, which is merely a superficial outgrowth from the bark. See prickle, 1.

2. The backbone; the rachis, spina, or spinal column of a vertebrate. The name is due to the series of spinous processes of the several vertebrae which it presents, forming a ridge along the middle of the back. See spinal column (under spinal), and vertebra, vertebral.

3. A name of some part in various animals. (a) In anat., a sharp process, point, or crest of bone; a spinous process, generally stouter than a styloid process; as, the spine of the ilium of the ischium, of the scapula of the pubis. See cuts under innominate and shoulder-blade. (b) In morph., a bony element, or pair of bony elements, which completes a segment of either the neural canal or the hemal canal of a vertebrate on the middle of the dorsal or ventral aspect of the body, the ossification intervening dorsad between a pair of neuropophyses or ventrad between a pair of hemapophyses, the former being a neural spine, the latter a hemal spine. Thus, the spinous process of a dorsal vertebra is the neural spine of that vertebra, and the segment of the sternum with which the rib of that vertebra articulates is the hemal spine of the same vertebra. Owen. See cuts under dorsal, carapace, and endoskeleton. (c) In mammal., a modified hair; a sharp, stiff, hard, horny dermal outgrowth, as one of the quills of a porcupine, or of the prickles of the hedgehog or spiny ant-eater. In many animals the transition from soft fur through harsh or bristly pelage to spines is very gradual. See cuts under Echidnidae, Erinaceus, and porcupine. (d) In ornith., a spur or encure, as of the wing or foot; a mucro, as of a feather. See cuts under Palamedea, flascors, and macronate. (e) In herpet., a sharp, prickly scale of considerable size; a horn. See cuts under Crotalus and Phrynosoma. (f) In conch., any considerable sharp projection of the shell. Such spines are endlessly modified in size, shape, and site. Good examples are figured under muræx, scorpion-shell, and Spondylus. (g) In Crustacea, any considerable spinous process of the carapace, of the legs, etc. Snail spines are the rule with most crustaceans. The large tail-spine of some is specified as the telson. (h) In entom., any comparatively short sharp projection of the chitinous body-wall of an insect. Such occur commonly upon the larvæ of Lepidoptera, upon the bodies of many adult Coleoptera, Hemiptera, and Hymenoptera, and upon the legs (principally upon the tibiae) of these and nearly all Orthoptera and many Neuroptera. The body-spines of adult insects are always of great use in classification. (i) In ichth., (1) A fin-spine; one of the unjointed and unbranched sharp bony rays of the fins, such as those the presence of which gives name to the acanthopterygian fishes; a spinous fin-ray, as distinguished from a soft ray. See ray, 7, and the formula under radial, a. (2) A spinous process, as of an opercular bone. (3) The spinous process of some ganoid, placoid, etc., scales. See cuts under Echinorhynchus, sand-fish, scale, searaven, and shackled-joint. (j) In celothodermas, one of the movable processes which beset the exterior, as of an echinus, and are articulated with the tubercles of the body-wall. Primary spines are the large ones forming continuous series along the ambulacra, as distinguished from less-developed secondary and tertiary spines. Other spines are specified as scutal. See cuts under Cidaris, Echinometra, Echinus, semita, and Spatangus. (k) In general, some or any hard sharp process, like a spine; a thorn; a prickle: as, the spine at the end of the tail of the lion or the fer-de-lance.

4. In mach., any longitudinal ridge; a fin. E. H. Knight.—5. In lace-making, a raised projection from the cordonnet: one of the varieties of pinwork; especially, one of many small points that project outward from the edge of the lace, forming a sort of fringe.—6. The duramen or heartwood of trees: a ship-builders' term. See duramen.—Angular curvature of the spine. See curvature.—Anterior superior spine of the ilium. See spines of the ilium.—Concussion of the spine, in theoretic strictness, a molecular lesion of the spinal cord too fine for microscopic detection, but impairing the functions of the cord, and produced by violent jarring, as in a railway accident: often applied, without discrimination, to cases which, after an accident, exhibit various nervous or spinal symptoms without any manifest gross lesion which explains them. These include cases of traumatic neurasthenia, of hemorrhage in the cord or its membranes, of displacement and fracture of vertebrae, and of muscular and ligamentous strains.—Ethmoidal spine, a projection of the sphenoid bone for articulation with the cribriform plate of the ethmoid.—Hemal spine. See def. 3 (b), and hemal.—Interhemal spine. See interhemal.—Interneural spine. See interneural.—Lateral curvature of the spine. See curvature.—Mental external spine, the mental protuberance of the human mandible.—Mental spines, the gonial tubercles. See gonial.—Nasal, pharyngeal, pleural spine. See the adjectives.—Palatine spine. See (posterior) nasal spine, under nasal.—Posterior superior spine of the ilium. See spines of the ilium.—Pubic spine. See below, and pubic.—Railway spine, concussion of the spine (especially in its more vague sense) resulting from railway accident.—Scapular spine. Same as spine of the scapula.

—Sciotic spine, the spine of the ischium.—Semital spine. See semital.—Spine of the ischium, a pointed triangular eminence situated a little below the middle of the posterior border of the ischium, and separating the lesser from the greater sacrosciatic notch. In man the pudic vessels and nerve wind around this spine.—Spine of the pubis, the pubic spine, a prominent tubercle which projects from the upper border of the pubis about an inch from the symphysis.—Spine of the scapula, the scapular spine, in man a prominent plate of bone separating the supraspinous and infraspinous fossae, and terminating in the acromion.—Spine of the sphenoid, a projection from the lower part of the greater wing of the sphenoid, extending backward into the angle between the petrous and squamous divisions of the temporal bone. Also called spinous process of the sphenoid.—Spines of the ilium, the iliac spines. In man these are four in number: the anterior extremity of the iliac crest terminates in the anterior superior spine, below which and separated from it by a concavity is the anterior inferior spine; in a similar manner the posterior extremity of the iliac crest terminates in the posterior superior spine, while below it is the posterior inferior spine, the two being separated by a notch.—Spines of the tibia, a pair of processes between the two articular surfaces of the head of the tibia, in the interior of the knee-joint, to which are attached the ends of the semilunar cartilages and the crucial ligaments of the joint.—Three-spined spine, a small spine-like projection upon the orbital part of the frontal bone for attachment of the pulley of the superior oblique muscle of the eye.

spine-armed (spín'árm'd), a. Armed with spines or spiny processes, as a murex; spinigerous.

spineback (spín'bák), n. A fish of the family Notacanthidae.

spine-bearer (spín'báir'ér), n. A spine-bearing caterpillar.

spine-bearing (spín'báir'ing), a. Having spines; spined or spiny; spinigerous.

spinebelly (spín'bel'í), n. A kind of balloon-fish, Tetraodon lineatus, more fully called striped spinebelly. See cut under balloon-fish.

spinebill (spín'bíl), n. An Australian meliphagino bird, Acanthorhynchus tenuirostris, formerly called slender-billed creeper, or another of this genus, A. superciliosus. In both these honey-eaters the bill is slender, curved, and extremely acute. They are closely related to the members of the genus Myzomela, but present a totally different pattern of coloration. The first-named is widely distributed on the continent and in Tasmania; the second inhabits western and southwestern Australia.

spined (spín'd), a. [< spine + -ed]. 1. Having a spine or spinal column; backbone; vertebrate. 2. Having spines; spinous or spiny: as, a spined caterpillar; the spined cicadas.—Spined soldier-bug. See soldier-bug.

spinefoot (spín'fút), n. A lizard of the genus Acanthodactylus, as A. vulgaris of northern Africa.

spinel (spín'el or spín-el'), n. [Also spinelle, espinel; early mod. E. spiuclle; < OF. spinelle, espinelle, F. spinelle = It. spindella, spindel; prob. orig. applied to a mineral with spine-shaped crystals; dim. of L. spina, a thorn, spine: see spine.] 1. A mineral of various shades of red, also blue, green, yellow, brown, and black, commonly occurring in isometric octahedrons. It has the hardness of topaz. Chemically, it consists of the oxides of magnesium and aluminum, with iron protoxide in some varieties, also chromium in the variety picotite. Clear and finely colored red varieties are highly prized as ornamental stones in jewelry. The red varieties are known as spinel ruby or balas ruby, while those of a dark-green, brown, or black color, containing iron protoxide in considerable amount, are called ceylonite or pleonaste. The valuable varieties, including the spinel ruby (see ruby), occur as rolled pebbles in river-channels in Ceylon, Burma, and Siam; they are often associated with the true ruby (corundum). The spinel group of minerals includes several species which may be considered as made up of equal parts of a protoxide and a sesquioxide (RO + R<sub>2</sub>O<sub>3</sub>). Here belong galuiste, magnetite, franklinite, etc. An octahedral habit characterizes them all.

There [in the Island of Zeylan] is also founde an other kynde of Rubies, which wee caule Spinnelle and the Indians Caropus. R. Eden, tr. of Antonio Pigafetta (First Books [on America], ed. Arber, p. 264).

2. A bleached yarn from which the linen tapo called inklo is made. E. H. Knight.—Zinc-spinel. Same as galuiste.

spineless (spín'les), a. [< spine + -less]. 1. Having no spine or spinal column; invertebrate. Hence—2. Having no backbone, vigor, or courage; limp; weak; nerveless.—3. Having the backbone flexible or supple.

A whole family of Sprites, consisting of a remarkably stout father and three spineless sons. Dickens, Uncommercial Traveller, iv. (Davies.)

4. In ichth., having no fin-spines; soft-finned; anacanthine; malacocephalous: as, the spineless fishes, or Anacanthini.—Spineless perch, a piraterch.

spinellane (spi-nel'an), n. [< spinelle + -ane]. A blue variety of nesean occurring in small crystalline masses and in minute crystals, found near Andernach on the Rhine.

spinelle (spi-nel'), n. See spinel.

spine-rayed (spín'räd), a. In ichth., acanthopterygian.

spinescent (spi-nés'ent), a. [< L. spinescen(t)-s, pp. of spinescere, grow thorny, < spina, a thorn, prickle, spino: see spine.] 1. In bot., tending to be hard and thorn-like; terminating in a spine or sharp point; armed with spines or thorns; spinose.—2. In zool., somewhat spinous or spiny, as the fur of an animal; very coarse, harsh, or stiff, as hair; spinulose.

spinet (spín'et), n. [< L. spinetum, a thicket of thorns, < spina, a thorn, spine: see spine. Cf. OF. spinet, F. dial. épinet, a thicket of thorns; and see spinney.] A small wood or place where briars and thorns grow; a spinney.

A satyr, lodged in a little spinet, by which her majesty and the Prince were to come, . . . advanced his head above the top of the wood. B. Jonson, The Satyr.

spinet (spín'et or spi-not'), n. [Formerly also spinnet, espinette; = D. spinet = G. Sw. spinet = Dan. spinet, < OF. espinette, F. épinette = Sp. Pg. espineta, < It. spinetta, a spinet, or pair of virginals (said to be so called because struck with a pointed quill), < spinetta, a point, spigot, etc., dim. of spina, a thorn, < L. spina, a thorn: see spine.] A musical instrument essentially similar to the harpsichord, but of smaller size and much lighter tone. Also called virginal and couched harp.—Dumb spinet. Same as manichord.

spinetail (spín'täl), n. In ornith.: (a) A passerine bird of the family Dendrocolaptidae, having stiff and more or less acuminate tail-feathers, much like a woodpecker's; a spine-tailed or sclerurine bird. See cut under saberbill and Sclerurus. (b) A cypseline bird of the subfamily Chaturinae; a spine-tailed or chaturine swift, having mucronate shafts of the tail-feathers. See Acanthyllis, and cut under mucronate. (c) The ruddy duck, Erismatura rubida. [Pennsylvania and New Jersey.]

spine-tailed (spín'täld), a. 1. In ornith.: (a) Having stiff and generally acuminate tail-feathers; dendrocolaptine; sclerurine. (b) Having mucronate shafts of the tail-feathers; chaturine.—2. In herpet., having the tail ending in a spine, as a serpent. See fer-de-lance, and cut under Craspidoccephalus and Cyclura.—3. In entom., having the abdomen ending in a spine or spines. The Scotidae are known as spine-tailed wasps, and the Sapygidae have been called parasitic spine-tailed wasps. See cut under Ela.

spine-tipped (spín'tipt), a. In bot., tipped with or bearing at the extremity a spine, as the leaves of agave.

spin-house (spín'hous), n. A place in which spinning is carried on. Also spinning-honse. See the quotation.

As we returned we stepp'd in to see the Spin-house, a kind of Birdwell, where incorrigible and lewd women are kept in discipline and labour. Evelyn, Diary, Aug. 10, 1641.

spinocerebrate (spi-ni-ser'ë-brät), a. [< L. spina, the spine, + cerebrum, the brain, + -ate]. Having a brain and spinal cord; cerebrospinal; myelencephalous.

spindeltoid (spi-ni-del'toid), a. and n. [< L. spina, the spine, + E. deltoid]. 1. a. Representing that part of the human deltoid muscle which arises from the spine of the scapula, as a muscle; pertaining to the spindeltoides.

II. n. The spindeltoides. spindeltoides (spi-ni-del-toi'dë-us), n.; pl. spindeltoides (-i). [NL.: see spindeltoid.] A muscle of the shoulder and arm of some animals, corresponding to the spinal or mesoscapular part of the human deltoides; it extends from the mesoscapula and metacromion to the deltoid ridge of the humerus.

spiniferite (spi-nif'ë-rit), n. [< L. spinifer, bearing spines (see spiniferous), + -ite]. A certain minute organism beset with spines, occurring in the Chalk flints. Their real nature is unascertained, but they have been supposed to be the gemmules of sponges.

spiniferous (spi-nif'ë-rus), a. [< L. spinifer, bearing spines, < spina, a thorn, spine, + ferre = E. bear]. Bearing or provided with spines; spinous or spiny; spinigerous.

spiniform (spi-ni-för'm), a. [< L. spina, a thorn, spine, + forma, form]. Having the form of a spine or thorn; spine-like. Hurley.

spinigerous (spi-nij'ë-rus), a. [< LL. spiniger, bearing thorns or spines, < L. spina, a thorn, spine, + gerere, bear, carry.] Bearing spines, as a hedgehog; spinose; aculeate; spiniferous.—Spinigerous elytra, in entom., elytra each one of which has an upright sutural process, the two uniting, when the elytra are closed, to form a large spiniform process on the back, as in certain phytophagous beetles.

Spinigrada (spi-nig'rä-dj), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of spinigradus: see spinigrade.] An order of echinoderms, composed of the ophiurans and euryaleans, or the brittle-stars and gorgon's-heads. Forbes. [Rare.]

spinigrade (spi-ni-gräd), a. [< NL. spinigradus, < L. spina, a thorn, spine, + grad, walk, go: see grade]. Moving by means of spines or spinous processes, as an echinoderm; of or pertaining to the Spinigrada.

spininess (spi-ni-nes), n. Spiny character or state. (a) Thorniness. (b) Slenderness; slinness; lankness.

The old men resemble grasshoppers for their cold and bloodless spininess. Chapman, Iliad, iii. Commentarius.

spinirector (spi-ni-rek'tor), a. and n. [< L. spina, the spine, + rector for NL. erector, q. v.] I. a. Erecting, extending, or straightening the spine, or spinal column: noting the set or series of muscles of the back of which the erector spinae is the basis.

II. n. The erector spinae. (See erector.) It corresponds to the so-called fourth layer of the muscles of the back in human anatomy. Cones and Shute, 1887.

spinispicule (spi-ni-spi-k'ül), n. [< L. spina, a spine, + E. spicule]. A spiny sponge-spicule; a spiraster.

spinispirula (spi-ni-spir'ë-lä), n.; pl. spinispirulae (-lä). [NL., < L. spina, a spine, + spirula, a small twisted cake, dim. of spira, a coil, spiro: see spire.] A spiny sigmaspire; a sigmoid microscelere or flesh-spicule provided with spines. Also called spiraster. Sollas.

spinispirular (spi-ni-spir'ë-lär), a. [< spinispirula + -ar]. Spiny and slightly spiral, as a sponge-spicule; having the character of a spinispirula. Sollas.

spinispirulate (spi-ni-spir'ë-lät), a. [< spinispirula + -ate]. Same as spinispirular.

spinitis (spi-ni'tis), n. [NL., < L. spina, the spine, + -itis.] Inflammation of the spinal cord and its membranes, in the horse and other domestic quadrupeds.

spinitrapezium (spi-ni-trä-pë'zi-us), n.; pl. spinitrapezia (-i). [NL., < L. spina, the spine, + NL. trapezium.] The spinal as distinguished from the cranial part of the trapezium muscle, forming in some animals a nearly distinct muscle.

spink (spingk), n. [< ME. spink, spynk, spynke = Sw. dial. spink, also spikke, spekke, a sparrow (gull-spink, a goldfinch), = Norw. spikke (for **spinke*), a sparrow or other small bird; cf. Gr. σπίγγος, also σπίκα, a finch (< σπίζω, chirp); an imitative name, like the equiv. pink, finch.] The chaffinch, Fringilla caelebs. [Prov. Eng.]

The spink chants sweetest in a hedge of thorns. W. Harte.

spink (spingk), n. [Origin obscure; prob. in part a var. of pink.] The primrose, Primula veris; also, the lady's-smock, Cardamine pratensis (also bog-spinks), and some other plants. [Scotland.]

spinnaker (spín-ä-kér), n. [Said to be < spin, in senso of 'go rapidly'.] A jib-headed racing-sail carried by yachts, set, when running before the wind, on the side opposite to the mainsail.

spinnel (spín'el), n. A dialectal variant of spind.

spinner (spín'ér), n. [< ME. spinnere, spynner, spinnare (= D. G. spinner = Sw. spinnare = Dan. spinder); < spin + -er. Cf. spider.] 1. One who or that which spins, in any sense; one skilled in spinning. (a) A workman who gives shape to vessels of thin metal by means of a turning-lathe. See spin, r. 1, 8. (b) In woolen-manuf., any thread-spinning machine; a drawing and twisting machine for making woolen threads. (c) A trawling fish hook fitted with wings to make it revolve in the water; a propeller spoon-bait. (d) In hat-manuf., a machine for finishing the exterior of a hat. It consists of a flat oval table with a face corresponding to the curve of the hat-brim.

2. A spider; especially, a spinning-spider.

As if thou hadst borrowed legs of a spinner and a voice of a cricket. B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, l. 1.

3. See the quotation. [Eng.]

I do not know whether the daddly longlegs is ever called "gin spinner": but Jenny Spinner is certainly the name of a very different insect, viz. the metamorphosis of the iron-blue dun, which, according to Rorلد's nomenclature, is an epimeria of the genus Clo.

N. and Q., 7th ser., VI. 153.

4. A spinneret.—5. The night-jar or night-churr, Caprimulgus europæus: from its cries, which may be likened to the noise of a spinning-wheel. See ent under night-jar. Also wheel-bird. Compare reeler in like use for another bird. [Wexford, Ireland.]—Ring-and-traveler spinner. Same as ring-frame.

spinner<sup>2</sup>, n. [ME. spynner; origin obscure.] A kind of bont.

As on Monday next after May day there come tydyngs to London, that on Thursday before the Duke of Suffolk come unto the costes of Kent full nero slower with his l. shepes and a litel spynner; the qweche spynner he sente with certeyn letters to certeyn of his trustid men.

Paston Letters, I. 124.

A part or organ concerned in the spinning of silk, gossamer, or cobweb, as of a silkworm or spider. Specifically—(a) One of the mamillæ of the arachnidium of a spider; one of the four, six, or eight little conical or nipple-like processes under a spider's abdomen and near its end, through which the viscid secretion of the arachnidial glands is spun out into threads of silk. Some of the spinnerets are three-jointed. See arachnidium. (b) One of the tubules of the labium of certain caterpillars, as silkworms, through which silk is spun out of the secretion of glands connected with the mouthparts. See sericterium. (c) One of the tubules of the anal segment of certain coleopterous larvae, as in the first larval stage (trungulin) of some blister-beetles (Meloidæ), through which a little silk is spun. See cut under Sitaris. (d) A like organ of any other insect.

spinnery (spin'ér-i), n.; pl. spinneries (-iz). [= D. spinnertij, a spinning-house, = G. spinnerei = Sw. spinnari = Dan. spindert, spinning, spinning-house; as spin + -ery.] A spinning-mill. Imp. Dict.

spinneth, n. See spinet<sup>2</sup>.

spinney, spinny<sup>2</sup> (spin'i), n. [*ME. *spineye*, spenne, < OF. espineye, espinoie, espinoie, F. épine, a thicket, grove, a thorny plot, < L. spineta, a thicket of thorns, < spina, a thorn; see spine. Cf. spinet<sup>2</sup>.] A small wood with undergrowth; a clump of trees or shrubs; a small grove or shrubbery.

As he spent our a spenn, to spyre the schrowe.

Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), I. 1895.

A land . . . covered with fine hedgerow timber, with here and there a nice little grove or spinney.

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, I. 1.

spinning (spin'ing), n. [ME. spynnyng; verbal n. of spin, v.] 1. The act of one who spins.—2. The process of giving shape to vessels of thin metal by means of a turning-lathe.

spinning-frame (spin'ing-frām), n. A machine by which cotton thread was twisted hard and firm, so as to make it suitable for the warp of cotton cloth: the invention of Richard Arkwright. E. H. Knight.

spinning-head (spin'ing-hed), n. An early form of spinning-machine in which the drawing and twisting mechanisms are combined in one head.

spinning-house (spin'ing-hous), n. Same as spin-house.

spinning-jack (spin'ing-jak), n. In cotton-manuf., a device for twisting and winding a sliver as it comes from the drawing-rollers. It is placed in the can, in which it rotates, the sliver being wound on a bobbin. E. H. Knight.

spinning-jenny (spin'ing-jen'i), n. A spinning-machine, invented by James Hargreaves

a, frame; b, frames supporting spindles; c, drum driven by the hand from the hand-wheel; d, and carrying separate hands (not shown) which separately drive each spindle; e, fluted wooden clasp which travels on wheels on the top of the frame, and in which the rovings are arranged in due order.

in 1767, which was the first to operate upon more than one thread. It has a series of vertical spindles, each of which is supplied with roving from a separate spool, and has a clasping and traversing mechanism by means of which the operator is enabled to clasp and draw out all the rovings simultaneously during the operation of twisting, and to feed the twisted threads to the spindles when winding on—the whole operation being almost exactly like hand-spinning, except that a large number of rovings are operated upon instead of a single one.

spinning-machine (spin'ing-ma-shēn'), n. 1. Any machine for spinning; a mule; a spinner. Specifically—2. An apparatus which spins continuously, as distinguished from the intermittent action of the mule. E. H. Knight.

spinning-mill (spin'ing-mil), n. A mill or factory where thread is spun.

spinning-mite (spin'ing-mit), n. Any mite or acarid of the family Tetranychidae; a red-spider.

spinning-organ (spin'ing-ór-gan), n. The organ or apparatus by means of which a spider or caterpillar spins silk; an arachnidium, as of a spider. See cut under arachnidium.

spinning-roller (spin'ing-ról-ler), n. One of the iron wheels, covered with various materials—as rubber, vulcanite, paper, or felt—running in pairs in the drawing mechanism of a spinning-machine.

spinning-spider (spin'ing-spi'dér), n. A spider which spins cobwebs; specifically, a true spider or araneid, as distinguished from any other arachnid, whether it actually spins or not.

spinning-wart (spin'ing-wárt), n. A spinneret; one of the papille or mamillæ out of which a spider spins silk. See cut under arachnidium. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 291.

spinning-wheel (spin'ing-hwél), n. A machine for spinning wool, cotton, or flax into threads by hand. It consists of a wheel, band, and spindle, and a, bench; b, standards; c, driving hand-wheel with flat rim, turned by the peg k held in the right hand of the spinner; d, cord-band, crossed at and driving the speed-pulley f; e, cord-band imparting motion to the spindle g; f, thread in process of spinning.

is driven by foot or by hand. Before the introduction of machinery for spinning there were two kinds of spinning-wheels in common use—the large wheel for spinning wool and cotton, and the small or Saxon wheel for spinning flax. The girle-wheel was a spinning-wheel formerly in use, small enough to be fastened to a girle or apron-string, and used while standing or walking about.

Spinning-wheel for Flax.

a, bench or stool; b, standards; c, driving hand-wheel grooved in its perimeter; d, treadle; e, rod which connects treadle with crank; f, cord-band which drives the flax spindle; g, flax; h, distaff upon which the flax to be spun is placed, and which in use is held in the left hand of the operator.

They plow it early in the year, and then there will come some spiny grass that will keep it from scalding.

Mortimer.

spinode (spí'nód), n. [L. spina, a thorn, spine, + nodus, a knot.] In geom., a stationary point or cusp on a curve. A spinode may be conceived as resulting from the vanishing of the angle at a node between the two branches, the length of arc between them being reduced to zero, just as an inflection may be regarded as resulting from the vanishing of the interval between the two points of tangency of a bitangent, the total curvature between them at the same time vanishing. But this view in the latter case includes all the points of the inflectional tangent as points of the curve, and in the former case includes all lines through the spinode as tangents. For this reason the spinode, like the inflection, is reckoned as a distinct kind of singularity. A curve cannot, while remaining real, change continuously from having a cusp to having no cusp without passing through a form in which it has a spinode.

spinode-curve (spí'nód-kérv), n. A singularity of a surface consisting in a locus of points where tangent-planes to the curve intersect it in curves having spinodes at those points. The spinode-curve on a real surface is the boundary between a synclastic and an anticlastic region. It bears no resemblance to that singularity of a surface termed the cuspidal curve.

spinode-torse (spí'nód-tòrs), n. That torse of which a spinode-curve is the edge of regression. It is the envelop of tangent-planes to a surface intersecting it in curves having spinodes.

spinose (spí'nós), a. [L. spinosus, full of thorns; see spinous.] Full of spines; spinous; spinigerous or spiuiferous; armed with spines or thorns; of a spiny character: as, a spinose leaf; a spinose stem.—Spinose maxilla, in entom., maxilla armed with spines at the apex, as in the dragon-fly.

spinously (spí'nós-li), adv. In bot., in a spinose manner.

spinosity (spí-nós'i-ti), n.; pl. spinostities (-tiz). [L. spinosita (-t)s, thorniness, < spinosus, thorny, spiny: see spinous.] 1. The state of being spinous or spinose; rough, spinous, or thorny character or quality; thorniness: literally or figuratively.

The part of Human Philosophy which is Rational . . . seemeth but a net of subtilty and spinosity.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II.

2. A thorny part or thing; something thorny or crabbed.

spinous (spí'uns), a. [= F. épineux = Sp. espinoso = Pg. espinoso = It. spinoso, < L. spinus, full of thorns, thorny, spiny, < spina, a thorn, spino: see spine.] 1. In zool. and anat.: (a) Having spines; spiny; spinigerous or spiniferous. (b) Shaped like a spine; spiniform; having the character of a spine; sharp or pointed: as, a spinous process of bone. See spinose.—2. In bot., same as spinose.—Spinous foramen, the foramen spinosum of the sphenoid. See cut under foramen.—Spinous process of a vertebra, one of the elements of most vertebrae, usually autogenous, or having its own center of ossification, forming a process, point, or plate of bone where the lateral halves of the neural arch, or neurapophyses, come together behind (in man) or above the neural arch; a neural spine. See cut under axis, cervical, dorsal, hypapophysis, lumbar, and vertebra.—Spinous process of the sphenoid. See spine of the sphenoid, under spine.—Spinous rat, a spiny rat, in any sense.—Spinous shark. See shark, and Echinorhinus (with cut).—Spinous spider-crab, Maia squinado, the common spider-crab.

spinous-radiate (spí'nus-rá-dí-üt), a. In entom., rayed or encircled with spines.

Spinozism (spí-nó'zizm), n. [Spinoza (see def.) + -ism.] The metaphysical doctrine of Baruch (afterward Benedict) de Spinoza (1632–1677), a Spanish Jew, born at Amsterdam. Spinoza's chief work, the "Ethics," is an exposition of the idea of the absolute, with a monistic theory of the correspondence between mind and matter, and applications to the philosophy of living. It is an excessively abstruse doctrine, much misunderstood, and too complicated for brief exposition. The style of the book, an imitation of Euclid's "Elements," is calculated to repel the mathematician and logician, and to carry the attention of the ordinary reader away from the real meaning, while conveying a completely false notion of the mode of thinking. Yet, while the form is pseudomathematical, the thought itself is truly mathematical. The main principle is, indeed, an anticipation in a generalized form of the modern geometrical conception of the absolute, especially as this appears in the hyperbolic geometry, where the point and plane manifolds have a correspondence similar to that between Spinoza's worlds of extension and thought. Spinoza is described as a pantheist; he identifies God and Nature, but does not mean by Nature what is ordinarily meant. Some sayings of Spinoza are frequently quoted in literature. One of these is incommutabilitas est negatio, "all specification involves exclusion"; another is that matters must be considered sub specie eternitatis, "under their essential aspects."

Spinozist (spí-nó'zist), n. [Spinoza + -ist.] A follower of Spinoza.

Spinozistic (spí-nó-zis'tik), a. [Spinozist + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of Spinoza or his followers: as, the Spinozistic school; Spinozistic pantheism.

spinstor (spin'stér), n. [ME. spinstor, spynstare, spinnestere, spynnester (= D. spinstor), with suffix -estre (E. -ster), < AS. spinnan, spin: see spin.] 1. A woman who spins; by extension, any person who spins; a spinner.

My wif was a webbe and wollen cloth made.

In spak to the spynnesters to spynnen hit oute.

Piers Plowman (C), vii. 222.

The silkworm is Only man's spinstor.

Randolph, Muses' Looking-Glass, iv. 1.

Let the three housewifely spinstors of destiny rather curtail the thread of thy life.

Dekker, Gull's Hornbook, p. 83.

2. An unmarried woman (so called because she was supposed to occupy herself with spinning): the legal designation in England of all unmarried women from a viscount's daughter downward; popularly, an elderly unmarried woman; an "old maid": sometimes used adjectively.

I, Anthony Lumpkin, Esquire, of Blank place, refuse you, Constantia Neville, spinstor, of no place at all.

Goldsmith, Sho Stoops to Conquer, v. 1.

O, that I should live to hear myself called Spinster!
Sheridan, The Rivals, v. 1.
 Here the spinster aunt uttered a loud shriek, and became senseless.
Dickens, Pickwick, x.
 3†. A woman of an evil life or character: so called from being forced to spin in the house of correction. See spin-house.

We are no spinsters; nor, if you look upon us, so wretched as you take us.
Fletcher (and another?), Prophetess, iii. 1.
spinsterdom (spin'stēr-dum), n. [< spinster + -dom.] Spinsters or "old maids" collectively. G. Meredith, Manfred, ii. 2. [Rare.]
spinsterhood (spin'stēr-hūd), n. [< spinster + -hood.] The state of being a spinster; unmarried life or state.
spinsterhood (spin'stēr-ship), n. [< spinster + -ship.] Spinsterhood. Southey.
spinstress (spin'stress), n. [< spinster + -ess.] A woman who spins, or whose occupation is spinning; a spinster.

Let meander souls by virtue be enjoined,
 As the good Greelan spinstress (Penelope) was of old.
Tom Brown, Works, IV. 10. (Davies.)
spinstry (spin'stri), n. [< spinster + -y (cf. -cry).] The work or occupation of spinning; spinning.

What new decency can be added to this your spinstry?
Milton, Church-Government, ii. 2.
spintext (spin'tekt), n. [< spin, v., + obj. text.] One who spins out long dreary discourses; a prosy preacher.

The race of formal spintexts and solemn saygraces is nearly extinct.
V. Enos, Winter Evenings, ix.
spinthere (spin'thēr), n. [= F. spinthère, < Gr. σπινθήρ, a spark.] A greenish-gray variety of sphene or titanite.
spintry (spin'tri), n. [< L. spintria, spintrita, a male prostitute.] A male prostitute. [Rare.]

Ravished hence, like captives, and, in sight
 Of their most grieved parents, dealt away
 Unto his spintries, sculleries, and slaves.
B. Jonson, Sejanus, iv. 5.

spinula (spin'ū-lā), n.; pl. spinulæ (-lō). [NL., < L. spinula, dim. of spina, a spine: see spine.] In entom., a minute spine or hook. Specifically—(a) One of the little hooks bordering the anterior edge of the lower wing in most Hymenoptera: same as hamulus, 1 (a). (b) One of the bristles forming the strigilis.

spinulate (spin'ū-lāt), a. [< spinula + -atē.] In zool., covered with little spines.—Spinulate hairs, hairs emitting minute rigid branches or spinules: such hairs cover many lepidopterous insects.

spinulated (spin'ū-lāt), a. [< spinulate + -ed.] Same as spinulate.

spinule (spin'ū-l), n. [< L. spinula, dim. of spina, a thorn, spine: see spine.] A small spine; a spinule.

spinulescent (spin'ū-les'ent), a. [< spinule + -escent.] In bot., producing diminutive spinules; somewhat spiny or thorny.

spinuliferous (spin'ū-lif'e-rus), a. [< L. spinula, a spinule, + ferre = E. bear.] In bot., same as spinulose.

spinulose (spin'ū-lōs), a. [< NL. spinulosus: see spinulose.] In bot. and zool., furnished with spinules or diminutive spines.

I have never seen any prominent spine upon the posterior elevation, though it is sometimes minutely spinulose.
Huxley, Crayfish, p. 234.

spinulosus (spin'ū-lus), a. [< NL. spinulosus, < L. spinula, a spinule: see spinulc.] Same as spinulose.

spinus (spī'nus), n. [NL., < Gr. σπινός, a bird of the finch kind; cf. spinuk.] 1†. An old name of some small bird which feeds on seeds, as a thistle-bird, linnet, siskin, or bunting. Hence—2. [cap.] A genus of thistle-birds named by Koch in 1816, containing the linnet, the siskin or aberdevine, the goldfinch, the redpoll, and others, both of Europe and of America. In present usage, the siskin is Spinus pinus, the pine-finch is S. pinus, the goldfinch of Europe is S. carduelis, that of America is S. tristis, etc. The name wavers in application, and is more or less inexact synonymy with several others, as Acanthis, Carduelis, Chrysomitris, Astragalinus, Agiothis, Laniaria, Laniola, etc. See cuts under siskin and goldfinch.

spiny (spī'ni), a. [< spinc + -y.] 1. Having thorns or spines; full of spines; thorny; prickly.—2. Figuratively, thorny; perplexed; difficult; troublesome.

The spiny desarts of scholastic philosophy.
Parburton, On Prophecy, p. 61. (Latham.)
 3†. Thin; slim; slendor.
 As in well-grown woods, on trees, cold spiny grasshoppers Sit chirping
Chapman, Iliad, iii. 161.
 Faith, thou art such a spiny bald-rib, all the mistresses
 In the town will never get thee up.
Middleton, Mayor of Queenborough, iii. 3.

Spiny ealamary, a cephalopod of the genus Acanthoteuthis. P. P. Carpenter.—Spiny crab, a crab whose carapace is spiny, or has spinous processes; a spider-crab or maioid. See cut under Oxyrhyncha.—Spiny fish, a spiny-finned or acanthopterygian fish.—Spiny lobster. See lobster.—Spiny rat, one of sundry small rat-like rodents whose pelage is more or less spiny. (a) One of the South American species of *Echimy*s and Loncheres or Nelomys. See cut under *Echimy*s. (b) One of several pouched rats of the genus Heteromys.

spiny-eel (spī'ni-ēl), n. See Mastacembelidae.
spiny-finned (spī'ni-find), a. In ichth., having spinous fin-rays; spine-finned; acanthopterygious.

spiny-skinned (spī'ni-skind), a. Echinodermatous.

spiont (spī'on), n. [Early mod. E. also spyon; = D. G. Sw. Dan. spion, < OF. (and F.) espion, a spy: see spy. Cf. espionage.] A spy.

Captaine of the Spions.
Heywood, Four Prentises of London (Works, 1874, II. 242).

spira, v. An obsolete form of spicer.
spira (spī'ri), n.; pl. spiræ (-rē). [L., the base of a column, a spire: see spire.] In arch., the moldings at the base of a column; a torus. Such a molding or moldings are not present in the Greek Doric order of architecture, but the feature is constant in all varieties of the Ionic and Corinthian. See cuts under base, 3.

spirable (spī'rā-bl), a. [< L. spirabilis, that may be breathed, respirable, < spirare, breathe, blow: see spire.] Capable of being breathed; respirable.

The spirable odor and pestilent steame ascending from it put him out of his bias of congruity.
Nashe, Lenten Stuffs (Harl. Mss., VI. 173). (Davies.)

spiracle (spī'r or spī'rā-kl), n. [< ME. spyrakle, < OF. spiracle, vernacularly spirail, csprail = It. spiracolo, < L. spiraculum, a breathing-hole, air-hole, < spirare, breathe: see spire.] 1. An aperture or orifice.

And after XL dnyes this spiracle
 Is uppe to close, and whenne the [you] list, it [the wine] drinke.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 202.

2. In zool., an aperture, orifice, or vent through which air, vapor, or water passes in the act of respiration; a breathing-hole; a spiraculum: applied to many different formations. Specifically—(a) In Mammalia, the nostril or blow-hole of a cetacean, as the whale, porpoise, etc., through which air, mixed with spray or water, is expelled. (b) In ichth., (1) An aperture on the upper side of the head, in front of the suspensorium of the lower jaw, observed in many fishes, as selachians and ganoids. This is the external opening of the hyomandibular cleft, or persistent first postoral visceral cleft, of the embryo. (2) The single nostril of the monorhine vertebrates, or myzonts—the lampreys and hags. (c) In entom., a breathing-hole; the external orifice of one of the tracheæ or windpipes of an arachnid or myriapod, opening in the side of the body. In true insects (Hexapoda) the spiracles are typically twenty-two in number, a pair (one on each side) for each of the three thoracic segments, and for each of the anterior eight abdominal segments; but they are almost always lacking on some one or more of these. They are either simple openings into the respiratory system, or are provided with valves, sieves, or fringes of hair for the exclusion of foreign particles. See cut under Systæchus.

spiracula, n. Plural of spiraculum.

*spiracula*² (spī-rak'ū-lī), n.; pl. spiraculæ (-lō). [NL.: see spiracle.] In entom., same as spiracle.

spiracular (spī-rak'ū-līr), a. and n. [< spiraculum + -ar.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to a spiracle, breathing-hole, or blow-hole.—2. Fitted for or permitting respiration, as a spiraculo; respiratory.—Spiracular arch, in ichth., one of the visceral arches of some fishes, between the mandibular and hyomandibular arches, in special relation with the spiracular cleft and spiracle.—Spiracular cleft, in ichth., the hyomandibular cleft: so called from its relations to the spiracle in certain fishes, as all selachians and various ganoids. See spiracle, 2 (b) (1).—Spiracular gill, a false gill, or pseudobranch.—Spiracular respiration, breathing through spiracles, as in the tracheal respiration of many insects.

II. n. A small bone or cartilago in special relation with the spiracle of some fishes.

A series of small ossicles, of which two may be distinguished as spiraculars.
Encyc. Brit., XII. 648.

spiraculate (spī-rak'ū-lāt), a. [< spiraculum + -atē.] Provided with a spiracle.

spiraculiferous (spī-rak'ū-lif'e-rus), a. [< L. spiraculum, a breathing-hole, + ferre = E. bear.] In entom., bearing a spiracle or breathing-pore: said of segments in which these organs are visible. See cut under Systæchus.
Westwood.

spiraculiform (spī-rak'ū-li-fōrm), a. [< L. spiraculum, a breathing-hole, + forma, form.] In entom., having the structure, form, or appearance of a spiracle; stigmatiform.

spiraculum (spī-rak'ū-lum), n.; pl. spiracula (-lī). [L.: see spiracle.] 1. A spiracle, in any sense.—2. A breathing-hole in the aventaile, beaver, or messail of a helmet.

spiræ, n. Plural of spira.

Spiræa (spī-rē'ā), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. spiræa, < Gr. σπειρα, meadow-sweet, so called from the shape of its follicles, < σπειρα, a coil, spire: see spire.] 1. A genus of rosaceous plants, type of the Spiræa. It is characterized by fruit commonly of five follicles, containing usually numerous linear seeds with a membranous or rarely coriaceous outer seed-coat and little or no albumen. The flowers have four or five calyx-lobes, as many rounded petals, twenty to sixty filiform stamens, and a smooth or woolly fleshy disk. The Himalayan S. parvifolia is an exception in its solitary seeds and obconical calyx. There are about 50 species, widely scattered through temperate and cold regions of the northern hemisphere, and occurring rarely on mountains within the tropics. They are herbs or shrubs, bearing alternate simple pinnate or ternately compound leaves, usually furnished with free or wing-like and united stipules. The small white, pink, or rose-colored flowers form a copious axillary or terminal inflorescence, which is either a raceme, cyme, panicle, or corymb, or consists, as in S. Aruncus, of a diffuse panicle composed of numerous elongated slender spikes. Most of the species are highly ornamental in flower. They are now most commonly known, especially in cultivation, by the generic name Spiræa. Eleven species are natives of Europe, 3 of which occur in England; of these S. Filipendula is the dropwort, and the others, S. salicifolia and S. Ulmaria, are known as meadow-sweet (the latter also as queen-of-the-meadows, which see). Six species are natives of the northeastern United States, of which S. salicifolia is the most widely distributed, a shrub with slender ascending spire-like branches, popularly known in the west as steepbush, in America usually with white flowers, in Europe, Siberia, Mongolia, and Japan pink or rose-colored. It is often cultivated, especially in Russia, where a great many varieties have originated; in Wales it forms a large part of the hedges. For S. tomentosa, a similar pink-flowered eastern species, see hardhack; its representative on the Pacific coast, S. Douglasii, with handsome whitened leaves, is one of the most showy of American shrubs. For S. lobata, see queen-of-the-prairie, and for S. Aruncus, goat's-beard; the latter is one of the most ornamental plants of eastern woodland borders. For S. hypericifolia, common in cultivation from Europe and Siberia, and also called Italian may and St. Peter's wreath, see bridal-wreath. Several species from Japan are now abundant in ornamental grounds, as S. Japonica and its variety S. Fortunei, and S. prunifolia, the plum-leaved spiræa, a white-flowered shrub with handsome silky leaves. S. Thunbergii from Japan is much used in parks, forming a small diffuse shrub 2 or 3 feet high with light recurring branches whitened before the leaves with a profusion of small flowers usually in threes in the axils. Some Asiatic species with pinnate leaves and large terminal panicles of white flowers are arborescent, as S. sorbifolia, often seen as a shrub in New England dooryards, and S. Kamchatka, with the panicles very large, the flowers fragrant and feathery. The former S. opulifolia, the ninebark, and its variety aurea, the golden spindle of gardens, are now referred to Neillia, or by some separated as a genus Physocarpus. Many species possess moderate astringent or tonic properties; the roots of the British species are so used, and the flowers of S. hypericifolia; S. Ulmaria is valuable also as a diuretic. S. tomentosa, the principal American medicinal species, a plant of bitter and astringent taste, is used in New England and also formerly by the Indians as a tonic.

Flowering Branch of Hardhack (Spiræa tomentosa).
 a, flower; b, fruit; c, leaf.

2. [l. c.] (a) A plant of this genus. (b) The white-flowered shrub Astilbe Japonica, now extensively imported into the United States and propagated under glass, forming one of the chief materials of Easter decorations.

Spirææ (spī-rē'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1865), < Spiræa + -æ.] A tribe of poly-petalous plants, of the order Rosaceæ. It is characterized by flowers with bractless and commonly persistent calyx-lobes, ten or more stamens, from one to eight superior carpels, usually each with two or more pendulous ovules, either indehiscent or ripening into follicles, and not included within the calyx-tube. It consists of 10 genera, of which Spiræa is the type. They are usually shrubs, all natives of the northern hemisphere; Spiræa only is of wide distribution; 4 others are confined to North America, of which Nerissa is found only in Alabama, and Adenostoma in California. Four or five other genera are confined to Japan and China.

spiræic (spī-rē'ik), a. [< NL. Spiræa + -ic.] 1. Pertaining to or derived from Spiræa.—2†. Same as salicylic.

spiral (spī'ral), a. and n. [< F. spirale = Sp. Pg. espiral = It. spirale = D. spiraal = G. Sw. Dan. spiral, < ML. spiralis, spiral (linca spiralis, a spiral line, a spiral), < L. spira, a coil, spire: see spire.<sup>2</sup> 1. a. 1. Of or pertaining to a spire or coil; like a spire; pointed or shaped like a spire.—2. Winding around a fixed point or center, and continually receding from it, like a waterspring; specifically, in conch., making a number of turns about the columella or axis of the shell; whorled. The whorls may be in one plane, producing the flat or discoid shell, or oftener wound into a spire, resulting in the ordinary turreted form. Compare cuts under Planorbis and Limnaea, and see spire.<sup>2</sup>, 2. 3. Winding and at the same time rising or advancing like a screw-thread: more accurately helical or helicoidal.

Flat Spiral of an Ammonite (Ammonites tyroni).

Where upward, in the mellow blush of day,
The noisy biller wheeled his spiral way.
Longfellow, Sunrise on the Hills.

Spiral axis. See axis.—Spiral balance, a form of balance in which the weight of the body under examination is measured by the stretching (torsion) of an elastic wire in the form of a long spiral. A common use of the simple form of spiral balance (see cut) is in determining the specific gravity of small fragments of minerals, which for this purpose are weighed first in the upper pan and then in that below, which is immersed in water.—Spiral canal of the cochlea, of the medulla. See canal, and cut under earl.—Spiral duct, in bot., same as spiral vessel.—Spiral fracture, a fracture of bone due to torsion, so that the broken ends have a more or less screw-like appearance.—Spiral gearing. See gearing.—Spiral layer, the middle one of the three layers or coats of the tracheal wall in insects. See tamidium and trachea.—Spiral ligament of the cochlea, the spiral ridge at the outer insertion of the basilar membrane: it is prismatic, or triangular in section.—Spiral line, the line connecting the radii or radiating lines of a geometrical spiral; web, and forming a continuous spiral from the circumference nearly to the center. It is formed after the radii have been put in place.—Spiral nebula, phyllocladus, plexus. See the nouns.—Spiral point. See spire.<sup>2</sup>, 3.—Spiral pteropods, the Limacina.—Spiral pump, a form of the Archimedeal screw water-elevator. See Archimedeal screw, under Archimedeal.—Spiral screw. See screw.—Spiral space, the area bounded at its two ends by successive parts of the same radius vector, mid within and without by successive parts of the same spiral.—Spiral spring. See spring.—Spiral valve, in ichth., a continuous fold or ridge of mucous membrane which winds spirally about the interior of the intestine of some fishes, as ganoids.—Spiral vessel, in bot., a vessel which is usually long, with fusiform extremities, and has the walls thickened in a spiral manner with one or more simple or branched bands or fibers. In most cases the direction of the spiral is from right to left, but it frequently happens that the earlier formed spirals run in one direction, while those formed later run in an opposite direction. See tissue, vessel.—Spiral wheels, in mach. See wheel.

II. n. 1. In geom., a plano curve which runs continuously round and round a fixed point, called the center, with constantly increasing radius vector, so that the latter is never normal to the curve; also, a part of such a curve in the course of which the radius from the center describes 360°. Besides the spirals mentioned below, the involute of the circle and the cycloids are very important. The principal spirals which have received attention are the spiral of Archimedes (usually understood to have been discovered by Conon the Samian), the radius of which increases uniformly with the angle; the hyperbolic spiral, whose radius vector is inversely proportional to the angle; the lituus, the square of whose radius vector is inversely proportional to the angle; and the logarithmic spiral, whose angle is proportional to the logarithm of the radius vector.

Spiral Vessel or Duct of Euballium Elatium.

Parabolic Spiral. Archimedeal Spiral.

Hyperbolic Spiral. (Less of the inner part of one branch is shown than of the other.)

2. A helix or curve which winds round a cylinder like a screw.—3. A spiral spring.—4. In wool, one of the curls or convolutions in wool-fiber, the number of which in a unit of length is made the basis of an estimate of its quality for manufacturing.—5. In zool. and anat., a spiral formation, as of a univalve, of the cochlea, etc.—Airy's spirals, the peculiar colored interference figures seen when two sections of quartz, one of a right-handed the other of a left-handed crystal, both cut transverse to the vertical axis, are placed one over the other, and viewed in converging polarized light.—Curschmann's spirals, in pathol., bodies formed of spirally wound mucous threads with often a fine shining central thread. They seem to be casts of small bronchial, and are expected in asthma and certain forms of bronchitis.—Double, equiangular, logarithmic, lexicodromic spiral. See the adjectives.—Logistic spiral. Same as logarithmic spiral (which see, under logarithmic).—Nerwiche spiral, that second involute of the circle whose apex is midway between the center of the first involute and the center of the circle: so called because first shown by Sylvester at the meeting of the British Association at Norwich in 1863.—Parabolic spiral. See parabolic, and cut above.

Spiral (spī'ral), v. t.; pret. and pp. spiraled, spiralled, ppr. spiraling, spiralling. [spiral, n.] To make spiral; cause to move spirally.

The teeth of the cutter should be made to run slightly spiraled.
Joshua Rose, Tractell Machinist, p. 346.

Spirality (spī'ral-i-ti), n. [spiral + -ity.] Spiral character or quality. Science, III. 583.

Spirally (spī'ral-i), adv. In the form or manner of a spiral.

Spiral-tail (spī'ral-tāl), n. The royal or king bird of paradise, Cinnurus regius: so called from the spiral coil at the end of the middle tail-feathers. See cut under Cinnurus.

Spirant (spī'rant), n. [L. spirant(-t)s, ppr. of spirare, breathe, blow, exhale: see spire.<sup>3</sup>] A consonant uttered with perceptible blowing, or expulsion of breath; an alphabetic sound in the utterance of which the organs are brought near together but not wholly closed; a rustling, or fricative, or continuant consonant. The term is by some restricted to sounds of the grade of vand, f, the th of thin and that of thine, and the German ch; others make it include also the sibilants; others, the semivowels w and y.

Spiranthes (spī-ran'thēz), n. [NL. (Richard, 1818), so called in allusion to the spiral arrangement of the flowers; < Gr. σπειρα, a coil, spire, + άνθος, flower.] A genus of orchids, of the tribe Neottia, type of the subtribe Spirantheae. It is characterized by commonly spirally-ranked and somewhat ringent flowers with the upper sepal and the two petals erect or connivent and glandular, and the lateral sepals set obliquely on the ovary, or less decurrent, and by a column not prolonged into a free appendage, but usually decurrent on the ovary. There are about 80 species, widely dispersed through temperate and tropical regions of both hemispheres. They are terrestrial herbs from short rootstock or a cluster of fleshy fibers or thickened tubers. Many species produce small white or greenish fragrant flowers. In several spirals forming a dense spike; in some the spike is reduced to a single spiral or becomes straight and unilateral. The flowers are commonly small, but reach a large size in some tropical American species. The leaves are usually narrow, often grass-like. Six species are natives of the northeastern United States, all late-flowering and some of them then leafless. They are known as lady's-tresses, S. cernua also locally as wild tobacco, and S. gracilis as corkscrew-plant.

Spiranthic (spī-ran'thik), a. [Spiranth-y + -ic.] Of the nature of or affected with spiranthly.

Spiranthy (spī-ran'thi), n. [Gr. σπειρα, a coil, spire (see spire.<sup>2</sup>), + άνθος, a flower.] In bot., the abnormal dislocation of the organs of a flower in a spiral direction. Thus, Masters describes a curious flower of Cypripedium insigne, in which a displacement occurred by a spiral torsion proceeding from right to left, which involved the complete or partial suppression of the organs of the flower. Also spelled spiranthy.

Spiraster (spī-ras'tēr), n. [NL. < Gr. σπειρα, a coil, spire, + αστήρ, a star.] In sponges, an irregular polyact spicula in the form of a stout spiral with thick spines; a spinispirula. When these spines or rays are terminal, the spicula is called an amphisaster. Sollas.

Spirastrosa (spī-ras-trō'sū), n. pl. [NL.: see spirastrose.] In Sollas's classification of sponges, a group of eloristidan totetractinellidan sponges, generally provided with spirasters.

Spirastrose (spī-ras'trōs), a. [Spiraster + -ose (see -ous).] Having microscleres or flesh-spicules in the form of spirasters; of or pertaining to the Spirastrosa: distinguished from sterastrose.

Spirated (spī-rā-ted), a. [Spirare + -ate + -ed.] Formed into or like a spiral; twisted like a corkscrew. See cut under basin. [Rare.]

The males of this species [Antilope bezartica] have long, straight, spirated horns nearly parallel to each other, and directed backward. Darwin, Descent of Man, II. 235.

spiration (spī-rā'shon), n. [LL. spiratio(-n-), a breathing, < L. spirare, pp. spiratus, breathe, blow, exhale: see spire.<sup>3</sup>] 1. A breathing.

God did by a kind of spiration produce them.
Barrow, Sermons, II. xxxiv.

2. In theol., the act by which the procession of the Holy Ghost is held to take place; also, the relation or notion so constituted.

spire (spī), n. [Also spear (formerly also spcer), now commonly associated with spear.<sup>1</sup>; < ME. spire, spyre, spir, < AS. spīr, a stalk, = MLG. spīr, LG. spīr, a point, needle, sprout, = G. spīr, a needle, pointer, spīre, a spar, = Icel. spīra, a spar, still, a kind of beaker, = Sw. spīra, a spar, septon, pistil, = Dan. spīre, a spar, germ, shoot, spīr, a spar, spire (in arch.); perhaps connected with spike<sup>1</sup> and spine, or with spear.<sup>1</sup>] 1. A sprout or shoot of a plant.

An oak comth of a litel spire. Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 1335.

2. A stalk of grass or some similar plant; a spear.

Shal neuere spīr springen vp.
Piers Plowman (C), xiii. 180.

Pointed Spires of Flax, when green,
Will Ink supply, and Letters mark unseen.
Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

3. The continuation of the trunk in a more or less ocurrent tree above the point where branching begins.

No tops to be received, except the spire and such other top or limb as may be grown on the main piece [British oak for navy contracts].
Laslett, Timber, p. 72.

4. A name of various tall grasses, as the mar-ram, Ammophila arundinacea; the reed canary-grass, Phalaris arundinacea; and the common reed, Phragmites communis. Britten and Holland, Eng. Plant Names. [Prov. Eng.]—5. In mining, the tube carrying the train to the charge in the blast-hole: so called from the spires of grass or rushes used for the purpose. Also called reed or rush.—6. A body that shoots up to a point; a tapering body; a conical or pyramidal body; specifically, in arch., the tapering part of a steeple rising above the tower; a steeple; the great pinnacle, often of wood covered with lead, frequently crowning the crossing of the nave in large churches. The earliest spires, in the architectural sense, were merely pyramidal or conical roofs, specimens of which exist in some of the oldest Romanesque buildings. These roofs, becoming gradually elongated and more and more acute, resulted at length in the graceful tapering spire. Among the many existing medieval examples, that of Salisbury Cathedral is one of the finest; that of Senlis Cathedral, France, though not of great size, is one of the earliest of fully developed spires, and is admired for the purity and elegance of its design. The spires of medieval architecture are generally square, octagonal, or circular in plan; they are sometimes solid, more frequently hollow, and are variously ornamented with bands encircling them, with panels more or less enriched, and with pinnacles and spire-lights, which are of infinite variety. Their angles are sometimes crocketed, and they are often terminated by a finial. In later examples the general pyramidal outline is obtained by diminishing the diameter of the structure in successive stages, and this has been imitated in modern spires, in which the forms and details of classic architecture have been applied to an architectural creation essentially medieval. The term spire is sometimes restricted to signify such tapering structures, crowning towers or turrets, as have parapets at their base, while when the spire rises from the exterior of the wall of the tower, without the intervention of a parapet, it is called a branch. See also cuts under branch, 10, rood-steeple, and transept.

Spire of Senlis Cathedral, France; Early 13th century.

The glorious temple rear'd
After pile, far off appearing like a mount
Of alabaster, top'd with golden spires.
Milton, P. R., iv. 548.

7. The top or uppermost point of a thing; the summit.

To silence that
Which, to the spire and top of praises vouch'd,
Would seem but modest.
Shak., Cor., i. 9. 24.

spire (spī), v.; pret. and pp. spired, ppr. spiring. [ME. spiren, spyrin (= Dan. spīre = Sw. spira, germinate); < spīrē, n.] I. intrans. 1. To sprout, as grain in malting.—2. To shoot; shoot up sharply.

Yon cypress spiring high,
With pine and cedar spreading wide
Their darksome boughs on either side.
Wordsworth, White Doe of Rylstone, iv.

II. trans. 1. To shoot or send forth.

In gentle Ladies breast and bounteous race
Of woman kind it freest Flowre doth spire.
Spenser, F. Q., III. v. 52.

2. To furnish with a spire or spires.

Like rampired walls the houses lean,
All spired and domed and turreted,
Sheer to the valley's darkling green.
W. E. Henley, From a Window in Princes Street.

spire<sup>2</sup> (spir), n. [F. spire = Sp. Pg. espira = It. spira, < L. spira, < Gr. σπειρα, a coil, twist, wreath, spire, also a tore or anchor-ring. Cf. Gr. σπῆρ, a woven basket, L. sporta, a woven basket, Lith. spartas, a band. Hence spiral, etc.] 1. A winding line like the thread of a screw; anything wreathed or contorted; a coil; a curl; a twist; a wreath; a spiral.

His head . . .
With burnish'd neck of verdant gold erect Amidst his circling spires, that on the grass Floated redundant. Milton, P. L., ix. 502.

2. In conch., all the whorls of a spiral univalve above the aperture or the body-whorl, taken together as forming a turret. In most cases the spire is exerted from the last turn of the shell, giving the ordinary turreted conical or helicoid form of numberless gastropods; and in some long slender forms, of many turns and with small aperture, the spire makes most of the length of the shell, as figured at Cerithium, Cylin-drella, and Terebra, for example. In other cases, however, the spire scarcely protrudes from the body-whorl, and it may be even entirely included or contained in the latter, so that a depression or other formation occupies the usual position of the apex of the shell. (Compare cuts under cochlea, Cypraea, Cymbium, and Ovulum.) See also cut under univalve.

a, Spire of a Univalve (Imbricaria conica).

3. In math., a point at which different leaves of a Riemann's surface are connected. Also called a spiral point.

spire<sup>3</sup> (spir), v. t. [= OF. spirer, espicer, esperer = Sp. Pg. espirar = It. spirare, < L. spirare, breathe. Hence ult. spirit, etc., and aspire, conspire, expire, inspire, perspire, respire, transpire.] To breathe.

But see, a happy Borean blast did spire
From faire Pelorus parts, which brought us right.
Vivans, tr. of Virgil (1632). (Nares.)

spire<sup>5</sup> (spir), n. [OF. spirer.] The male of the red deer, Cervus claphus, in its third year.

A spire [has] brow [antler] and uprights.
W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 510.

spire-bearer (spir' bār' er), n. In conch., a spirifer.

And Baal's spired Stone to Dust was ground.
Cowley, Davids, ii.

spired<sup>2</sup> (spird), a. [< spire + -ed.] In conch., having a spire, as a univalve shell; spiriferous; turreted.

spire-light (spir' lit), n. A window or opening of any kind for light in a spire.

spire-steeple (spir' stē' pl), n. A spire considered as part of a steeple; a spire. [Rare.]

spiric (spir' rik), a. and n. [< Gr. σπειρικός, spiric, < σπειρα, a coil, < σπειρεν, sweep round.] 1. A. Pertaining to or in the form of a tore or anchor-ring. — spiric body, a tore. — spiric line. See line<sup>2</sup>.

II. n. A curve, the plane section of a tore. Such curves, which are bicircular quartics, were treated by the ancient geometers Eudoxus and Pappus.

spiricle (spir' i-kl), n. [< NL. spiricula, dim. of L. spira, a spire: see spire<sup>2</sup>.] In bot., one of the delicate coiled threads in the hairs on the surface of certain seeds and achenes, which uncoil when wet. They probably serve in fixing small and light seeds to the soil, in order that they may germinate.

Spirifer (spir' i-fer), n. [NL. (Sowerby, 1816), < L. spira, a coil, spire, + ferre = E. bear.] 1. The typical genus of Spiriferidae, having the long brachial appendages coiled into a pair of a, ventral view; b, dorsal view; c, lateral view.

spirals, called the carriage-spring apparatus, supported upon similarly convoluted shelly lamellæ, and the shell impunctate, with a long straight hinge-line. Numerous species range from the Lower Silurian to the Permian. S. hystericus is an example. Also called Spirifera, Spiriferus.
2. [I. c.] A member of this genus.

Spiriferidae (spir-i-fer'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spirifer + -idae.] A family of arthropomatous brachiopods with highly developed spiral appendages, typified by the genus Spirifer, containing numerous genera, ranging from the Lower Silurian to the Liassic.

spiriferine (spi-rif'e-rin), a. [< Spirifer + -ine.] Bearing brachial appendages in the form of a spiral; of or pertaining to the Spiriferidae.

spiriferoid (spi-rif'e-roid), n. and a. [< Spirifer + -oid.] 1. n. A brachiopod of the family Spiriferidae.

II. a. Resembling a spirifer; having characters of the Spiriferidae.

spiriferous (spi-rif'e-rus), a. [< NL. spirifer, < L. spira, a coil, spire, + ferre = E. bear.] 1. Having a spire, as a univalved shell; spired; turreted. — 2. Having spiral appendages, as a brachiopod; spiriferine. — 3. Containing or yielding fossil spirifers, as a geological stratum. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 507.

spirignath (spir'ig-nath), n. [< NL. spirignatha (Latreille, 1796), < **spirignathus*: see spirignathus.] The slender spirally coiled antlia or haustellum of lepidopterous insects. Also spirignatha, spirittrompe.

spirignathous (spi-rig' nā-thus), a. [< NL. spirignathus, < Gr. σπειρα, a coil, + ναός, a jaw.] Having a filiform sucking-tube coiled in a spiral, as a moth or butterfly; haustellate or antliate, as a lepidopterous insect.

spirillar (spir' i-lār), a. [< Spirillum + -ar.] In bot., belonging to or resembling the genus Spirillum.

Spirillum (spi-ril' um), n. [NL. (Ehrenberg, 1830), dim. of L. spira, a coil, spiro: see spire<sup>2</sup>.] A genus or form-genus of Schizomycetes or bacteria, having cylindrical or somewhat compressed spirally twisted cells. They are rigid and furnished at each end with a cilium, and multiply by transverse division, the parts soon separating from one another. This genus, which according to some authorities also embraces the genus known as Vibrio, contains many species, found in swamp-water, salt water, infusions, etc. See Schizomycetes. — Spirillum fever. See fever<sup>1</sup>.

spirit (spir' it), n. [< ME. spirit, spirite, spyrte, spyrte (also sprit, sprite, < E. spritel), < OF. esprit, esperit, espirit, F. esprit = Sp. espiritu = Pg. espirito = It. spirito, spirit (= G. Sw. Dan. spiritus, spirits of wine, etc.), < L. spiritus, a breathing or blowing (as of the wind), a breeze, the air, a breath, exhalation, the breath of life, life, mind, soul, spirit, also courage, haughtiness, etc., < L. spirare, ghost, < spirare, breathe: see spire<sup>3</sup>. Cf. spritel, a doublet of spirit.] 1. According to old and primitive modes of thought, an invisible corporeal thing of an airy nature, scarcely material, the principle of life, mediating between soul and body. The primitive and natural notion of life was that it consisted of the breath, and in most languages words etymologically signifying 'breath' are used to mean the principle of life. Spirit is one of these, and translates the Greek πνεύμα. The ordinary notion of the Greek philosophers was that the soul is warm air. This was strengthened by the discovery, about the time of Aristotle (who, however, does not share the opinion of the distinction between the veins and the arteries. It is found elaborately developed in the writings of the Stoics, and especially of Galen. The spirit in the body exists in various degrees of fineness. The coarser kinds confer only vegetative life, and betray themselves in eruptions, etc.; there are, besides, a vital spirit (πνεύμα ζωοτακός) and an animal or psychical spirit (πνεύμα ψυχικός). At birth man was said to possess only vegetative spirit, but as soon as he draws breath this was thought to be carried through the left ventricle and the arteries to every part of the body, becoming triturated, and conveying animal life to the whole. The spirits were also said to be in different states of tension or tone, causing greater or less energy of body and mind. The vital spirits, being carried to the ventricles of the brain, were there further refined, and converted into spirits of sense, or animal spirits. In vision these spirits dart out from the eye to the object, though this be the most distant star, and immediately return laden in some form with information. This doctrine, modified by the addition of an incorporeal soul, and confused with the Hebrew conception of a spirit, was generally believed down to and into the scientific era. Old writers, therefore, who use phrases which are still employed metaphorically must be understood as meaning them literally. See def. 3.

There is no malice in this burning coal;
The breath of heaven hath blown his spirit out.
Shak., K. John, iv. 1. 110.

From the kind heat which in the heart doth reign
The spirits of life do their beginning take;
These spirits of life, ascending to the brain,
When they come there the spirits of sense do make.

These spirits of sense in fantasie's high court
Judge of the forms of objects ill or well;
And so they send a good or ill report
Down to the heart, where all affections dwell.

Besides, another motive power doth rise
Out of the heart, from whose pure blood do spring
The vital spirits, which, borne in arteries, Continuall motion to all parts do bring.

Sir J. Davies, Nosce Teipsum.

Adam, now enforced to close his eyes,
Sunk down, and all his spirits became entranced.
Milton, P. L., xl. 419.

Thus much cannot be denied, that our soul acteth not immediately only upon bones, flesh, brains, and other such like gross parts of the body, but, first and chiefly, upon the animal spirits, as the immediate instruments of sense and fancy, as that by whose vigour and activity the other heavy and unwieldy bulk of the body is so nimbly moved. And therefore we know no reason why we may not assent here to that of Porphyrius: that the blood is the food and nourishment of the spirit, and that this spirit is the vehicle of the soul, or the more immediate seat of life.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, v. § 3.

2. The principle of life conceived as a fragment of the divine essence breathed into man by God. This conception is developed in the Old and New Testaments, in the writings of the Neoplatonists, and by theologians. In Biblical and theological language the spirit is the highest part of human nature, as most akin to the divine, connected mediately with the body through the soul, and spoken of alone, or in contradistinction to the body, or as distinguished from both body and soul (see soul).

All flesh died that moved upon the earth, . . . all in whose nostrils was the breath of the spirit of life.
Gen. vii. 21, 22.

The spirit of Elijah doth rest on Elisha. 2 Ki. ii. 15.
My spirit is consumed, my days are extinct, the grave is ready for me. Job xvii. 1.

Who among men knoweth the things of nman, save the spirit of the man, which is in him? 1 Cor. ii. 11 [R. V.]

Our body shall be turned into ashes, and our spirit shall vanish as the soft air. Wisdom of Solomon, ii. 3.

3. Metaphorically, animation; vivacity; exuberance of life; cheerfulness; courage; mettle; temper; humor; mood: usually in the plural. But in old writers this meaning is not figurative, since they conceived this quality to be due to the tension of animal spirits.

So feeble were his spirits, and so low.
Chaucer, C. T., l. 1361.

Hastings went to the council that morning in remarkably high spirits. J. Gairdner, Rich. III., ii.

All furnish'd, all in arms; . . .
As full of spirit as the month of May. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., iv. 1. 101.

I wonder you can have such spirits under so many distresses. Sheridan, School for Scandal, iv. 1.

4. A peculiar animating and inspiring principle; dominant influence; genius; that which pervades and tempers the conduct and thought of men, either singly or (especially) in bodies, and characterizes them or their works.

O spirit of love! how quick and fresh art thou!
Shak., T. N., i. 1. 9.

This shows plainly the democratical spirit which acts our deputies. Winthrop, Hist. New England, II. 141.

All seem to feel the spirit of the place,
And by the general reverence God is praised.
Wordsworth, Sonnets, iii. 48.

That is the best part of each writer which has nothing private in it: . . . that which in the study of a single artist you might not easily find, but in the study of many you would abstract as the spirit of them all.

Emerson, Compensation.

And that law of force which governs all the changes of character in a given people at a given time, which we call the Spirit of the Age, this also changes, though more slowly still.

W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 80.

5. The essence, real meaning, or intent of any statement, command, or contract: opposed to letter.

Who also hath made us able ministers of the new testament: not of the letter, but of the spirit: for the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life. 2 Cor. iii. 6.

The scientific principles of Aristotle were in spirit, if not in form, in contrast with those of modern science. W. Wallace, Epicureanism, p. 171.

6. Incorporeal, immaterial being or principle; personality, or a personality, unconnected or only associated with a body: in Biblical use applied to God, and specifically [cap.] to the third person of the Trinity (the Holy Spirit); also to supernatural good and evil beings (angels).

God is a spirit: and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth. John iv. 24.

But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. 1 Cor. ii. 10.

Putting together the ideas of thinking and willing, or the power of moving or quieting corporeal motion, joined to substance, of which we have no distinct idea, we have the idea of an immaterial spirit. Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxiii. 15.

If we seclude space out of our consideration, there will remain but two sorts of substances in the world: that is, matter and mind; or, as we otherwise call them, body and spirit. Watts, Logic, I. ii. § 2.

Spirit exists everywhere in nature, and we know of no spirit outside of nature. Haeckel, Evol. of Man (trans.), II. 455.

7. A person considered with respect to his peculiar characteristics of mind or temper, especially as shown in action; a man of life, fire, energy, enterprise, courage, or the like, who influences or dominates: as, the leading spirits of the movement were arrested.

No place will please me so, no mean of death,
As here by Caesar, and by you cut off,
The choicest and master spirits of this age.

Shak., J. C., iii. 1. 163.

8. A disembodied soul, or a soul naturally destitute of an ordinary solid body; an apparition of such a being; a specter; a ghost.

Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it. Eccl. xii. 7.

Whilst he [the child] is young, be sure to preserve his tender mind from all impressions and notions of spirits and goblins or any fearful apprehensions in the dark.

Locke, Education, § 133.

9. A supernatural being; an angel, fairy, elf, sprite, demon, or the like.

I am a spirit of no common rate, . . .
And I will purge thy mortal grossness so That thou shalt like an airy spirit go.

Shak., M. N. D., iii. 1. 157.

And when Saul inquired of the Lord, the Lord answered him not, neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets. Then said Saul unto his servants, Seek me a woman that hath a familiar spirit.

1 Sam. xxviii. 6, 7.

Why, a spirit is such a little, little thing that I have heard a man who was a great scholar say that he'll dance ye a Lancashire hornpipe upon the point of a needle.

Addison, The Drummer.

10. A subtle fluid contained in a particular substance, and conferring upon it its peculiar properties. (a) In Bacon's philosophy, such a fluid for each kind of substance, living or dead.

The spirits or pneumatics, that are in all tangible bodies, are scarcely known. . . . Spirits are nothing else but a natural body, rarefied to a proportion, and included in the tangible parts of bodies, as in an luteum. And they be no less differing one from the other than the dense or tangible parts; . . . and they are never (almost) at rest; and from them and their motions principally proceed refraction, coagulation, concoction, maturation, putrefaction, vivification, and most of the effects of nature.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 93.

(b) In old chem., a liquor obtained by distillation: often in the plural.

11. A strong alcoholic liquor; in a restricted sense, such a liquor variously treated in the process of distillation, and used as a beverage or medicinally, as brandy, whisky, and gin; in the plural, any strong distilled liquor.

They are like too frequent use of Spirits in a time of health, which weaken the force of Nature by raising it too high.

Stillington, Sermons, II. ix.

12. A solution of tin in an acid, used in dyeing.—13. An aspirate; n breathing, as the letter h.

But be it [h] a letter or spirit, we have great use of it in our tongue, both before and after vowels.

B. Jonson, Eng. Grammar, iv.

spiritualism (spir'it-tū-āl-izm), n. [= F. spiritualisme = Sp. Pg. espiritualismo = It. spiritalismo; as spiritual + -ism.] 1. The state of being spiritual; spiritual character.

Millman.—2. In philos., the doctrine of the existence of spirit as distinct from matter, or as the only reality: opposed to materialism.—3. The belief that disembodied spirits can and do communicate with the living, especially through the agency of a person particularly susceptible to spiritualistic influences, called a medium; also, the various doctrines and theories, collectively, founded upon this belief.

In its modern form, spiritualism originated in the State of New York in the year 1848, and since that time has extended over the United States and Europe. The mediums through whom the supposed communications take place are of various kinds, no fewer than twenty-four different classes being mentioned in the books explanatory of spiritualism. Among the chief methods of communication are rappings, table-dippings, writing, and speaking; in the latter forms of communication the medium is supposed to be fully possessed by the spirit for the time being. Spiritualism has no formal system of theology, and it is contended by many of its advocates that it is not necessarily inconsistent with the maintenance of a faith otherwise Christian, and that spirit-communications are providential interventions for the purpose of inculcating the doctrine of immortality, and counteracting the material tendencies of the age. The meetings for spiritualistic communications are commonly called séances.

Also spiritism.

spiritualist (spir'it-tū-āl-ist), n. [= F. spiritaliste = Sp. Pg. espiritualista = It. spiritalista; as spiritual + -ist.] 1. One who professes a regard for spiritual things only; also, one whose employment is spiritual.

May not he that lives in a small thatched house . . . preach as loud, and to as much purpose, as one of those high and mighty spiritualists?

Echard, Grounds of Contempt of Clergy (1696), p. 140. (Latham.)

2. One who accepts philosophical spiritualism. See spiritualism, 2.

spirket (spēr'kot), n. [Origin obscure.] In ship-building, a space forward and aft between the floor-timbers. Hammersly.

spirketting, spirketting (spēr'kot-ing), n. [< spirket.] In ship-building, the strakes of plank worked between the lower sills of ports and waterways. Thearle, Naval Arch., § 209.

spiriling (spēr'ling), n. Same as sparking.

Spirobranchia (spi-rō-brang'ki-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σπειρα, a coil, spire, + βράχια, gills.] Same as Brachiopoda. Also Spirobranchia.

spirobranchiate (spi-rō-brang'ki-āt), a. and n. [< NL. spirobranchiatus, < Gr. σπειρα, a coil, spire, + βράχια, gills.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the Spirobranchiata; brachiopod.

II. n. A brachiopod.

Spirochæta (spi-rō-kē-tā), n. [NL. (Ehrenberg, 1833), < Gr. σπειρα, a coil, spire, + χαίτη, a bristle.]

A genus of Schizomycetes or bacteria, having the cells united in long slender threads which usually show narrow spiral windings. The filaments have the liveliest movements, and clearly propel themselves forward and back, but are also able to bend in various ways. S. plicatilis occurs among algae in swamp-water; S. Obermeieri, found in the blood of those sick with recurrent fever, is the cause of the disease; S. Cohnii is found in the mucus of the teeth, and S. gigantea in sea-water. Also Spirochæta.

Spirochæta Obermeieri.

spirogonimium (spi-rō-gō-nim'i-um), n.; pl. spirogonimia (-i). [NL., < Gr. σπειρα, a coil, spire, + NL. gonimium, q. v.] In bot., a gonimium similar to a hormogonimium, but nonfiliform, with the syngonimia subglobose, smaller and more scattered, as in Omphalaria.

Spirogyra (spi-rō-jī-rī), n. [NL. (Link, 1833), so called with ref. to the spiral bands of chlorophyll in the cells; < Gr. σπειρα, a coil, spire, + γύρος, a circle, ring.] A genus of fresh-water algae, of the class Conjugatæ and order Zygnemaceæ. They are among the commonest of fresh-water algae, forming dense bright-green masses, in both running and stagnant water, and have often a slimy feel, owing to the well-developed mucilaginous sheath in which each filament is enveloped. The cells have one to several parietal chlorophyll-bands spirally winding to the right. Conjugation is scalariform or lateral. There are about 40 species and very many varieties in the United States. They are popularly called frog-spit or frog-spittle. See frog-spit, and cuts under chlorophyll and conjugation, 4.

spirolet, spirolet (spī-rōl, -rol), n. [< OF. spirole, a small culverin.] A small culverin.

Long pieces of artillery called hosilets, and smaller sized ones, known by the name of spirolets.

Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, I. 47.

spiroloculine (spi-rō-lok'ū-lin), a. Composed of spirally coiled loculi or chamberlets: specifically noting certain foraminifers. Amer. Jour. Sci., No. 160, p. 328.

spirometer (spi-rom'e-tēr), n. [Irreg. < L. spirare, breathe (see spire), + metrum, measure.] A contrivance for measuring the extreme differential capacity of the human lungs.

The instrument most commonly employed consists of an inverted chamber submerged in a water-bath. The breath is conducted by a flexible pipe and internal tube so as to collect in the chamber, which rises in the water, and is fitted with an index which marks the cubic inches of air expired after a forced inspiration. In the accompanying cut, a is a small gas-holder containing an inverted vessel a'; b, index, which shows on the scale c the number of cubic inches expired; d, manometer, which, when a is held down, shows the pressure which the lungs can exert; e, plug-valve for outlet of expired air; f, cock for outlet of water; g, tube through which the expiration is made.

Spirometer.

spirometric (spi-rō-met'rik), a. [< Spirometer + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the spirometer; ascertained by means of the spirometer; as tested by the spirometer.—Spirometric capacity, extreme differential capacity of the lungs, measured by the total amount of air which can be expired after the fullest possible inspiration.

spirometry (spi-rom'e-tri), n. [< Spirometer + -y.] The use of the spirometer in measuring the capacity of the lungs.

Spiromonas (spi-rō-mō-nas), n. [NL. (Perty, 1852), < Gr. σπειρα, a coil, spire, + μόνος, a unit.] A genus of pantostomatous flagellate infusorians, spirally twisted on their long axis (whence the name). These animalcules are free-swimming or temporarily attached, soft and plastic, with two anterior subequal flagella, one of which is adherent at will. S. rotunda is an example. According to Kent, the Cyclidium distortum and Heteromita angulata of Dujardin are both species of Spiromonas.

spirophore (spī-rō-fōr), n. [Irreg. < L. spirare, breathe, + Gr. φέρω, < φέρω = E. bear.] An apparatus for producing artificial respiration in cases of suspended animation, as in persons rescued from drowning. It consists of an air-tight case, in which the body is inclosed up to the neck, and an air-pump, for producing at proper intervals a partial vacuum in the case, thus causing the external air to fill the lungs of the patient.

Spirophyton (spi-rot'i-ton), n. [NL. (Hall), < Gr. σπειρα, a coil, spire, + φύτον, a plant.] A genus of fossil algae, a characteristic plant of a subdivision of the Devonian occurring in the State of New York, and called from this fossil (Spirophyton cauda-galli) the cauda galli grit. This alga belongs to a group which appeared early in the Silurian, and continued into the Tertiary, but is now extinct. The frond of Spirophyton was broad, thin, with a distinct transversal nervation, and spirally convoluted around a slender axis, the convolution widening with the distance from the point of attachment.

spirozoid (spi-rō-zō'id), n. [< Gr. σπειρα, a coil, spire, + E. zoid.] The defensive zooid of certain hydroid hydrozoans, as of Podocoryne, a tubularian polyp: so called as coiling or curling spirally when not in action. These zooids are long slender filaments always provided with cilia or lasso-cells for netting, and are sometimes called spiralozooids. Compare dactylozooid and nachopopolyp.

spirt<sup>1</sup>, spirt<sup>2</sup>. See spurt<sup>1</sup>, spurt<sup>2</sup>.

spirtle, v. and n. See spurtle.

Spirula (spī-r'ū-lā), n. [NL. (Lamarck, 1799), < L. spirula, dim. of L. spira, a coil, spire: see spire.] 1. In Cephalopoda: (a)

A genus of sepoid cuttlefishes, typical of the family Spirulidae, having a delicate shell in the hinder part of the body rolled into a flat or discoidal spiral, with discrete whorls whose involute spiro presents ventrally, and no guard. There are several species, as S. larva and S. fragilis. The shells are common, and are sometimes carried by the Gulf Stream to the coast of England, but specimens of the entire animal are extremely rare. Also Spirulæ, Spirulæ. (b) [< L. c.; pl. spirulæ (-læ).] A member of this genus. Imp. Dict.—2. [< L. c.; pl. spirulæ (-læ).] In sponges, an irregular spineless polyact spicule of spiral form.

spittoon (spi-tōn'), n. [Irreg. < spit<sup>2</sup> + -oon.] A vessel for receiving what is spit from the mouth; especially, a round vessel of metal, earthenware, or porcelain, made in the form of a funnel at the top, and having a bowl-shaped compartment beneath, which may be partly filled with water; a cuspidor.

A gentleman with his hat on, who omused himself by spitting alternately into the spittoon at the right hand side of the stove and the spittoon on the left.

Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit, xvi.

The spit-venom of their poisoned hearts breaketh out to the annoyance of others. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, V. ii. § 2.

spitz (spits), n. [< G. spitz, also spitzhund, a Pomeranian dog, so called from its pointed muzzle; < spitz, a point: see spit<sup>1</sup>.] A spitz-dog.

spitz-dog (spits'dog), n. [A half translation of G. spitzhund, a Pomeranian dog, < spitz, a point, + hund, a dog, = E. hound.] A variety of dog, so called from the pointed muzzle; a Pomeranian dog. See Pomeranian.

spitzflute (spits'flüt), n. [< G. spitz, a point, + E. flute.] In organ-building, a stop having conical pipes of metal, which give a thin, somewhat reedy tone.

spitzkasten (spits'käs-ten), n. [< G. spitz, a point, + kasten, a chest: see chest<sup>1</sup>.] In mining, a pointed box; a V-rat; a German word frequently used by writers in English on ore-dressing.

Spiza (spi'zai), n. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1828), < Gr. σπιζα, a finch, < σπιζω, pipe, chirp. Cf. spink<sup>1</sup>.] A genus of fringilline birds, including a number of types, and hence variously limited. (a) That genus of painted finches of which the common indigo-bird of the United States is the type; synonymous with Passerina or Hartulanus of Vieillot, and Cyanopiza of Baird. See cut under indigo-bird. (b) Now employed for the silk-buntings, of which the common dickcissel or black-throated bunting, S. americana, is the type; synonymous with Dickcissel (Spiza americana).

Eurpiza. The male is 6½ inches long, 10½ in extent of wings; the plumage is smooth and compact; the upper parts are grayish-brown, streaked with black on the back; the lower are whitish, shaded with gray, tinged with bright yellow on the breast, and marked with a large black throat-patch; the edge of the wing is yellow; the lesser and middle coverts are bright-chestnut; the lower eyelid is white, the supercilious stripe yellow, and the bill dark horn-blue. The female is similar, but plainer, being less tinged with yellow, and having no black throat-patch, but a few black maxillary or pectoral streaks. This bunting is widely but irregularly distributed in the United States, especially in the eastern half, abounding in some districts, but seldom or never seen in others apparently as eligible. It nests on the ground or in a low bush, and lays four or five plain pale-greenish eggs (rarely speckled). The nuptial male has a quaint monotonous ditty, three notes of which are rendered in the name dickcissel—a word which originated in Illinois, and crept into print in or about 1876.

Spizæus (spi-zæ'e-us), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816), < Gr. σπιζα, a finch (see Spiza), + æros, an eagle.] A genus of Falconidae, including hawks or small eagles having the feet feathered to the bases of the toes, the tail square or little rounded, the wings short and rounded, and the head, in the typical species, with a long occipital crest. The genus is sometimes restricted to such birds as the crested eagle of Brazil, S. manducator or S. ornatiss; in a wider sense, it includes 12 or more species of Central and South America, Africa, India and the Indo-Malayan region, Celebes, Formosa, and Japan. Also Spizæos.

Spizella (spi-zel'i), n. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1832), < Spiza + dim. -ella.] A genus of small American finches or sparrows, the chipping-sparrows, having the wings pointed, the tail long and emarginate, the back streaked, and the under parts not streaked in the adult. It includes several of the most familiar sparrows of the United States, the chippy or chip-bird, S. socialis or domestica; the field-sparrow, S. agrestis or pusilla; the tree-sparrow, S. monticola; the clay-colored bunting and Brewer's bunting, S. pallida and S. breweri; and the black-chinned sparrow, S. atrigularis. See cut under field-sparrow.

Spizellina (spi-ze-li'ne), n. pl. [NL., < Spizella + -ina.] A subfamily of Fringillidae, containing a large number of small spotted and streaked sparrows. None of those which occur in the United States have any red, blue, or orange colors. S. F. Baird, 1858.

spizelline (spi-zel'in), a. [< Spizella + -ine.] Resembling or related to the chipping-sparrow; of or pertaining to the Spizellinae.

spizine (spi'zin), a. [< Spiza + -ine.] Resembling or related to the finches or buntings of the genus Spiza.

Splachneæ (splak'nē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Splachnum + -eæ.] A tribe of bryaceous mosses, named from the genus Splachnum. Also Splachnei, Splachnaeæ.

Splachnum (splak'num), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1753), < Gr. σπλάχνον, some cryptogamous plant.] A genus of bryaceous mosses, giving name to the tribe Splachneæ. They are loosely caespitose, mostly annual plants, with soft, slender branches, which bear distant lower and tufted upper leaves, all with very loose areolation. The capsule is long-pedicelled, small, oval or short-cylindrical, provided with a peristome of sixteen linear orange-colored teeth. There are 6 North American species.

splaiet, v. An old spelling of splay.

splanadēt, n. Same as splanade.

splanchnapophysial (splangk'nā-pō-fiz'i-āl), a. [< splanchnapophysis + -al.] Of or pertaining to a splanchnapophysis.

splanchnapophysis (splangk'nā-pō-fiz'i-sis), n. pl. splanchnapophyses (-sēz). [NL., < Gr. σπλάνχ- νον, pl. σπλάχνα, viscera, + ἀπόφυσις, an offshoot: see apophysis.] An apophysis or outgrowth of a vertebra on the opposite side of the vertebral axis from a neuropophysis, and inclosing or tending to inclose some viscera. See cut under hyapophysis.

splanchnic (splangk'nik), a. and n. [< Gr. σπλάνχικός, pertaining to the viscera, < σπλάχνον, pl. σπλάχνα, viscera, bowels.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the viscera or entrails; visceral; intestinal; enteric.—Splanchnic cavities, the visceral cavities of the body.—Splanchnic musculature, the muscles of the splanchnopleure; that one of the two chief layers of coelomatic muscles which surrounds the alimentary canal: contrasting with somatic musculature, or the muscles of the somatopleure.—Splanchnic nerves, three nerves from the thoracic sympathetic ganglia—the first or great, the second lesser or small, and the third smallest or inferior. The first goes to the semilunar ganglion, the second to the coeliac plexus, the third to the renal and coeliac plexuses.—Splanchnic wall, the splanchnopleure.

II. n. A splanchnic nerve.

splanchnocœle (splangk'nō-sēl), n. [< Gr. σπλάνχνον, pl. σπλάχνα, the viscera, + κοίλος, hollow.] A visceral cavity; specifically, the visceral cavity of a brachiopod, an anterior division of which is the brachioœle or brachial chamber, and the lateral parts of the posterior division of which are the pleuroœles.

splanchnographer (splangk-nog'ra-fēr), n. [< splanchnograph + -er.] One who describes viscera; a writer on splanchnography.

splanchnographical (splangk-nō-graf'i-āl), a. [< splanchnograph + -ic.] Descriptive of viscera; pertaining to splanchnography.

splanchnography (splangk-nog'ra-fig), n. [< Gr. σπλάνχνον, pl. σπλάχνα, viscera, + -γραφία, < γράφω, write.] Descriptive splanchnology; a description of or a treatise on viscera.

splanchnological (splangk-nō-loj'i-āl), a. [< splanchnology + -ic.] Of or pertaining to splanchnology.

splanchnologist (splangk-nō-lō-jist), n. [< splanchnology + -ist.] One who is versed in splanchnology.

splanchnology (splangk-nō-lō-ji), n. [< Gr. σπλάνχνον, pl. σπλάχνα, viscera, + -λογία, < λόγος, speak: see -ology.] The sum of scientific knowledge concerning viscera.

splanchnopleura (splangk-nō-plō'rā), n. pl. splanchnopleuræ (-rō). [NL.: see splanchnopleure.] Same as splanchnopleure.

splanchnopleural (splangk-nō-plō'rāl), a. [< splanchnopleure + -al.] Forming the walls of viscera; constituting or pertaining to the splanchnopleure.

splanchnopleure (splangk'nō-plō'rē), n. [< NL. splanchnopleura, < Gr. σπλάνχνον, pl. σπλάχνα, viscera, + πλευρά, the side.] The inner or visceral layer of mesoderm, formed by the splitting of the mesothelast, separated from the somatopleure by the perivisceral space, coelomatic cavity, or coeloma. It is formed in these animals whose germ becomes four-layered in the above manner, and then constitutes the musculature and connective tissue of the intestinal tract and its annexes—the lining epithelium being derived from the hypoblast. Thus, the connective tissue and muscular substance of the lungs, liver, kidneys, etc., and the thickness of the walls of the stomach, bowels, etc., are all splanchnopleural. The term is contrasted with somatopleure.

splanchnopleuric (splangk'nō-plō'rēk), a. [< splanchnopleure + -ic.] Same as splanchnopleural. Foster, Elements of Embryology, i. 2.

splanchnoskeletal (splangk-nō-skēl'e-tāl), a. [< splanchnoskeleton + -al.] Skeletal or hard, as a part of a viscus; forming a part of, or relating to, the splanchnoskeleton.

splanchnoskeleton (splangk'nō-skēl'e-tōn), n. [NL., < Gr. σπλάνχνον, pl. σπλάχνα, viscera, + σκελετόν, skeleton.] The splanchnic or visceral skeleton; those hard parts of the body, collectively considered, which are developed in special relation with the viscera, and serve to support or contain them. Such are teeth, branchial arches, tracheal rings, bonelets of the eyeball and heart, penis-bones, etc. The term originated with Carus, 1828, and acquired currency through Owen and others. Its difference of meaning from enteroskeleton is not clear in all its applications.

splanchnotomical (splangk-nō-tōm'i-āl), a. [< splanchnotomy + -ic.] Anatomical in respect of the viscera; of or pertaining to splanchnotomy.

splanchnotomy (splangk-not'ō-mi), n. [< Gr. σπλάνχνον, pl. σπλάχνα, viscera, + -τομία, < τέμνω, cut.] Dissection of the viscera; the anatomy of the viscera; more commonly called visceral anatomy.

splash (splash), v. [A var. of plash<sup>1</sup>, with unorig. s, regarded as intensive; perhaps 'suggested by the appar. relation of smash to mask.

1. trans. 1. To spatter or bespatter, as with water, mud, or any other liquid.

In earling a partridge, I splashed her with gravy from head to foot. Sydney Smith, To Francis Jeffrey, 1806.

2. To dash or throw about in splashes: as, to splash dirty water on one.—3. To accomplish with splashing or plashing.

The stout, round-stemmed little vessel ploughed and splashed its way up the Hudson, with great noise and little progress. Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 170.

4. To ornament with splashed decoration.—Syn. 1 and 2. Spill, etc. See stop.

II. intrans. 1. To dabble or spatter about in water or other liquid; dash or spatter water about.

It is in knowledge as in swimming; he who flounders and splashes on the surface makes more noise, and attracts more attention, than the pearl-diver who quietly dives in quest of treasures to the bottom.

Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 211.

2. To fall with or make a splashing sound.

The heavy burden splashed in the dark blue waters. Scott, Rob Roy, xxxi.

Splashing fremitus, fremitus caused by succession.
splash (splash), n. [< splash, v.] 1. Water or other liquid thrown upon anything.—2. A noise or effect as from water or mud thrown up or dashed about.

The splash and stir
Of fountains spouted up and showering down. Tennyson, Princess, l.

3. A spot of dirt or other discoloring or disfiguring matter; a blot; a dahl.

Her [Blanche's] very mode of writing is complex, nay, is careless, incoherent; with dashes and splashes, with involutions, abruptures, whiffs, and tortuosities. Carlyle, Varulagen von Enke's Memoirs.

4. A spot or splash of color strongly differing from the surrounding color, as on the hide of a horse, cow, or other animal.—5. A complexion-powder, generally the finest rice-flour, used by women to whiten their necks and faces.—6. A shad-wash.

splash-board (splash'board), n. A guard of wood, or an iron frame covered with leather, in front of a wheeled vehicle or a sleigh, to protect the occupants from the splashing of the horses' feet; a dash-board or dasher. The guard placed over a wheel (on a passenger railroad-car, at the ends of the steps to protect them from dirt thrown by the wheels) is also sometimes called a splash-board. Also splash-wing.

He filled the glass and put it on the splash-board of the wagonette. W. Black, In Far Lochaber, xix.

splasher (splash'er), n. [< splash + -er.] 1. One who or that which splashes. Specifically—2. That which is splashed; a contrivance to receive splashes that would otherwise deface the thing protected. (a) A guard placed over locomotive-wheels to protect persons on the engine or the machinery from the wheels, or from wet or dirt thrown up by them. (b) A guard over a wheel to prevent the splashes from entering the vehicle, or to protect the carmen of the riders on entering. (c) A screen placed behind a wash-stand to protect the wall from water that may be splashed.

splash-wing (splash'wing), n. Same as splash-board.

splashy (splash'y), a. [< splash + -y.] Full of dirty water; wet; wet and muddy; splashy.

Not far from hence is Sedgemore, a watery, splashy place. Dezob, Tour through Great Britain, II. 34. (Darwin.)

splat, v. t. [Early mod. E. splatte; < ME. splatten; a secondary form of split (f).] To split; splash; extend; spread out.

Splatte that pyke. Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 203.

Dull prose-folk Latin splatter. Burns, To William Simpson.

splatter-dash (splat'er-dash), n. An uproar; a bustle. [Colloq.]

splatterdashes (splat'er-dash-es), n. pl. Same as splatterdashes.

splatter-faced (splat'er-fäst), a. Broad- or flat-faced.

Oh, lawk I declare I be all of a tremble;
My mind II mingles me about Sukey Wimbble,
A splatter-faced wench, neither civil nor nimble!
T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Oxford, I. iv. (song).

splay (splä), v. t. [< ME. splayen, splayen, splayen; by aphesis from display: see display.] 1. To display; unfold; spread out; hence, to cut up; carve: as, to splay a fish.

The cock confesseth eminent enpide
When he his gemy tail begynneth splay.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 23.

To splayen out hiro leves on brede
Agyen the sunno.

Lydgate, Complaint of the Black Knight, l. 33.

2. To dislocate, as a horse's shoulder.—3. In arch., to slope; form with an oblique angle, as the jambs or sides of a window. See the noun.

splay (splä), n. [< splay, v.] 1. Spread; flaro.

By hammering in the corners of a bit, caro should be taken to preserve the splay throughout to the extremity, by properly inclining the face of the hammer.

Morgan, Mining Tools, p. 40.

2. In arch., a sloped surface, or a surface which makes an oblique angle with another, as when the opening through a wall for a door or window widens from the position of the door or window proper toward the face of the wall. A large chamber is called a splay.

Plan of Portal of Notre Dame, Paris. See splays.

Among the most marked of these defects in design of facade of Melina Cathedral is the projection of the great portal jambs, with their archivolts, beyond the faces of the buttresses, and the continuation of the splays to the outer faces of the jambs, so that those of the adjoining portals almost meet in a sharp edge.

C. H. Moore, Gothic Architecture, p. 110.

3. In fact., the outward widening of an embrasure from the mouth toward the exterior of the parapet. See embrasure.—Splay cut, an inclined cut on the edges of fancy brickwork.

splay (splä), a. [< splay, v.] Spread or spreading out; wide and flat; turned outward; hence, clumsy; awkward. See splay-foot, splay-mouth.

In the German mind, as in the German language, there does seem to be something splay, something blunt-edged, unhandy, and inefficient.

M. Arnold, Literature and Dogma, Pref.

splay (splä), v. t. [A var. of splay, prob. by confusion with splay.] Same as splay. Shak., M. for M., II. 1. 243.

splayer (splä'er), n. In tile-masonry, a segment of a cylinder used as a mold for curved tiles, as ridge- or hip-tiles, drain-tiles, etc.

splay-foot (splä'füt), n. and a. [< splay + -foot.] 1. n. A broad flat foot turned more or less outward. A splay-foot may be only coarse or uncouth, but in extreme cases it amounts to the deformity known as talipes valgus, a kind of clubfoot.

II. a. Having splay-feet; splay-footed.

Thou' still some traces of our rustic vein
And splay-foot verse remain'd and will remain.
Pope, Imitation of Horace, Epistle I, l. 271.

splay-footed (splä'füt'ed), a. [Early mod. E. also splay-footed; as splay-foot + -ed.] Having splay-feet.

Salutes from a splay-footed witch. . . .
Creaking of raven, or the screech of owl,
Are not so badling mischief.

Ford, Broken Heart, v. 1.

splay-mouth (splä'mouth), n. A naturally large or wide mouth; also, the mouth stretched wide in a grin or grimace.

Hadst thou but, Janus like, a face behind,
To see the people what splay-mouths they make.

Dryden, Ir. of Persia's Satires, l. 110.

splay-mouthed (splä'mouth'ed), a. Having a splay-mouth; making the mouth splay, as in a grimace.

These solemn, splay-mouth'd gentlemen, Madam, says I, only do II to improve in natural philosophy.

Tom Brown, Works, II. 271. (Darwin.)

spleen (splän), n. [< ME. spleen, splen, < OF. spleen, esplein, esplain, esplen, esplen = It. splene, < L. splen, < Gr. σπλην = L. lien (for orig. **splien*) = Skt. plihan (for orig. **splihan*), the spleen.] 1. A non-glandular, highly vascular organ which is situated in the abdomen, on the left side, in connection with the digestive organs, and in which the blood undergoes certain modifications in respect of its corpuscles. This viscous has no proper secretion and no excretory duct, and in these respects agrees with the thyroid, thymus, and adrenal bodies. In man the spleen is of an oblong flattened form, dark livid-red in color, soft and friable in texture, and extremely vascular. It lies in the left hypochondriac region, carrying the cardiac end of the stomach. The spleen has been supposed to be the seat of various emotions. Its enlargement or inflammation, under malarial poisoning, is known as agene-enke. See cut under pancreas.

I thought their spleens would break; they laugh'd us all Out of the room. Beau. and Fl., Maud's Tragedy, III. 2.

Spliced eye. Same as eye-splice.—Splicing-clamp, a clamp used to hold the ends or parts to be spliced.—To splice the main-brace. See main-brace.

splice (splis), n. [< splice, v.] 1. The joining together of two ropes or parts of a rope by interweaving part of the untwisted strands of each, or the union so effected. The short splice is used for a rope where it is not to pass through blocks. The long splice or round splice is made by unlaid the ends of ropes that are to be joined together and following the lay of one rope with a strand of the other until all the strands are used, and then neatly tucking the ends through the strands so that the size of the rope will not be changed. This occupies a great extent of rope, but by the three joinings being fixed at a distance from one another the increase of bulk is diminished, hence it is adapted to run through the sheave-hole of a block, etc. The eye-splice or ring-splice forms a sort of eye or circle at the end of a rope, and is used for splicing in thimbles, etc. See cut under eye-splice.

Splices of Ropes.
a, short splice; b, long splice; c, eye-splice.

2. The junction of two pieces of wood or metal by overlapping and bolting or otherwise fastening the ends; a scarf. See cut under scarf, 2.

spoilage (spoi'lāj), n. [< spoil + -age.] In printing, paper spoiled or wasted in presswork.

spoil-bank (spoi'bangk), n. In mining, the burrow or refuse-heap at the mouth of a shaft or adit-level: a term little used except in parts of England, and there chiefly in coal-mining.

spoil (spoi'lér), n. [< spoil + -er.] One who or that which spoils. (a) A plunderer; a pillager; a robber.

The anger of the Lord was hot against Israel, and he delivered them into the hands of spoilers that spoiled them.
Judges ii. 14.

(b) One who or that which impairs, mars, or decays.

Unchanged, the graven wonders pay
No tribute to the *spoil*er Time.
Waltier, The Rock in El Ghor.

spoil-five (spoi'fiv), n. A round game of cards, played with the whole pack, by from three to ten persons, each receiving five cards. Three tricks make the game, and when no one can take so many the game is said to be spoiled.

spoilful (spoi'fūl), a. [< spoil + -ful.] Rapacious; devastating; destructive. [Rare.]

Those spoilful Picts, and swarming Easterlings.
Spenser, F. Q., ii. x. 63.

spoil-paper (spoi'pā'pēr), n. [< spoil, v., + obj. paper.] A scribbler. [Humorous.]

As some Spoile-papers have dearly done of late.
A. Holland, Davies.

spoilsman (spoilz'man), n.; pl. spoilsmen (-men). [< spoils, pl. of spoil, + man.] An advocate of the spoils system; a politician who seeks personal profit at the public cost from the success of his party; one who maintains that party service should be rewarded with public office; one who is opposed to the administration of the civil service on the basis of merit. See spoils system, under spoil, n. [U. S.]

spoilsmonger (spoilz'mung'gér), n. One who distributes political spoils. See spoilsman. [U. S.]

spoil-sport (spoi'spōrt), n. [< spoil, v., + obj. sport.] One who spoils or hinders sport or enjoyment. Scott, Kenilworth, xxviii.

spoil. A past participle of spoil.

spoke (spōk), n. [Also dial. speke, spake; < ME. spoke, spake (pl. spokes, spoken, spaken), < AS. spāca (pl. spācau) = D. speak = MLG. spēke, LG. speke = OHG. speicha, speihha, MHG. G. speiche, a spoke; prob. not related to OHG. spahhā, shaving, splinter, G. dial. spache, a spoke, = MD. spaecke, a rod, D. spaak, a lever, roller, but perhaps related to spike: see spike. Cf. Ice. spōki, a piece of wood, spækja, a thin board.] 1. One of the bars, rods, or rungs which are inserted in the hub or nave of a wheel, and serve to support the rim or felly; a radius of a wheel. See cut under felly.

Lat brynge a cart wheel into this halle;
But looke that it have his spokes alle;
Twelve spokes hath a cart wheel comynly.
Chaucer, Summoner's Tale, l. 554.

Break all the spokes and felles from her wheel,
And bowl the round nave down the hill of heaven.
Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2. 517.

2. One of the rounds or rungs of a ladder.—3. One of a number of pins or handles jutting from the periphery of the steering-wheel of a vessel.—4. A bar of wood or metal so placed in or applied to the wheel of a vehicle as to prevent its turning, as when going down a hill. See second phrase below.

You would seem to be master! you would have your spoke in my cart!
B. Jonson, Poetaster, ii. 1.

I'll put a spoke among your wheels.
Fletcher, Mad Lover, iii. 5.

spoke-sizing machine, a machine for planing tenons of spokes to uniform size and shape. It has cutters with an adjustable angle-gage for beveling the edges of the tenons.—To put a spoke in one's wheel, to put an impediment in one's way; check or thwart one's purpose or effort.

It seems to me it would be a poor sort of religion to put a spoke in his wheel by refusing to say you don't believe such harm of him as you've got no good reason to believe.
George Eliot, Middlemarch, xiii.

spoke (spōk), v. t.; pret. and pp. spoked, ppr. spoking. [< spoke, n.] To fit or furnish with spokes: as, to spoke a wheel.

spoke (spōk). Preterit and obsolete past participle of speak.

spoke-auger (spōk'ā'gér), n. A hollow auger for forming the round tenons on the outer ends of spokes. E. H. Knight.

spoke-bone (spōk'bōn), n. The radius of the forearm.

spoke-gage (spōk'gāj), n. A device for testing the set of spokes in a hub. It consists of a mandrel with conical sleeves, which bear upon the ends of the spokes, and hold the hub true while the distance of the spokes is tested by the gage-pin in the staff. E. H. Knight.

spoke-lathe (spōk'lāth), n. A lathe for turning irregular forms, especially adapted for turning spokes, gun-stocks, handles, etc.

spoken (spō'kn), p. a. [Pp. of speak.] 1. Uttered; oral: opposed to written.—2. Speaking: in composition: as, a civil-spoken man.

The pleasantest-spoken gentleman you ever heard.
Dickens, Christmas Carol, iv.

spoke-pointer (spōk'poin'tér), n. A knife for trimming the ends of spoke-tenons. It is a form of circular plane, having a cutting-edge in a hollow cone, like a pencil-sharpener.

spoke-setter (spōk'set'tér), n. A machine by which a hub is centered to insure true borings for the spoke-mortises.

spoke-shave (spōk'shāv), n. A wheelwright's and carpenters' tool, having a plane-bit between two handles, formerly used in shaping

A, spoke-shave with blade a, made adjustable in the stock b, by adjusting-screws c; B, spoke-shave similar to A, but without the adjusting-screws; C, spoke-shave for working upon very concave surfaces; D, spoke-shave, in the nature of a small hand-plane, for smoothing and dressing off the straighter parts of spokes.

wagon-spokes, but now in woodwork of every kind.

spokesman (spōks'man), n.; pl. spokesmen (-men). [**spok's*, gon. of **spokc*, var. of speech (A.S. spæc, spæc, + man.) One who speaks for another or others; an advocate; a representative.

He shall be thy spokesman unto the people. Ex. iv. 16.

He is our Advocate—that is, a spokesman, comforter, intercessor, and mediator.

J. Bradford, Works (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 294.

spoke-trimmer (spōk'trim'er), n. A wheelwright's tool for trimming ends of spokes, etc., preparatory to using the spoke-pointer.

spoking-machine (spō'king-mā-shēn'), n. An apparatus for adjusting the spokes of a wheel to give them all the same inclination, and thus give the wheel a uniform dish.

spole (spōl), n. [A var. of spool.] 1. An obsolete or dialectal form of spool. Specifically—2. The small wheel near the distaff in the common spinning-wheel.

Then fly the spoles, the rapid axles glow,
And slowly circumsolve the labouring wheel below.
Darwin, Loves of the Plants, II. 103.

spolia, n. Plural of spolium.
spolia opima (spō'li-ā-pi'mi), [L.: spolia, pl. of spolium, spoil; opima, neut. pl. of opimus, fat, rich, plump; see opime.] In ancient Rome, the choicest spoil taken from an enemy; hence, any valuable booty or pillage.

Milton, however, was not destined to gather the spolia opima of English Rhetoric.
De Quincey, Rhetoric.

spoliary (spō'li-ā-ri), n.; pl. spoliaries (-ries). [L. spoliarium, a room or place, as in the amphitheater, where the bodies of slain gladiators were stripped of their clothes, also a den of robbers, < spolium, spoil: see spoil.] The place in Roman amphitheaters to which slaughtered gladiators were dragged, and where their clothes and arms were stripped from their bodies.

An Act of the Senate . . . is extant in Lampridius: "Let the Enemy of his Country be deprived of all his Titles; let the Parthian be drawn, let him be torn in pieces in the Spoliary."
Milton, Ans. to Salmasius.

spoliare (spō'li-ā-ri), v.; prot. and pp. spoliated, ppr. spoliating. [L. spoliatus, pp. of spoliare, spoil: see spoil, v.] I. trans. To plunder; pillage; despoil.

The other great Whig families, . . . who had done something more for it than spoliare their church and betray their king.
Disraeli, Sybil, I. 3.

II. intrans. To engage in robbery; plunder.
spoliation (spō'li-ā-shon), n. [L. spoliatio = Pr. exspoliatio = Sp. exspoliacion = It. spogliagione, < L. spoliatio (-n-), plundering, a spoiling, < spoliare, plunder, spoil: see spoliare, spoil, v.] 1. The act of pillaging, plundering, or spoiling; robbery; plunder.

He [Hastings] . . . declared that, if the spoliation which had been agreed upon were not instantly carried into effect, he would himself go to Lucknow, and do that from which feeble minds recoil with dismay.
Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

2. The act or practice of plundering in time of war, especially of plundering neutrals at sea under authority.—3. Eccles., the act of an incumbent in unlawfully taking the fruits of a benefice under a pretended title.—4. In law, intentional destruction of or tampering with (a document) in such way as to impair evidentiary effect.—French Spoliation Act, a United States statute of 1855 (23 Stat. at Large, 283) providing for the punishment of the French spoliation claims.—French spoliation claims, certain claims of citizens of the United States, or their representatives, against France for illegal captures, etc., prior to the treaty of 1800-1 between the United States and France. By this treaty these claims were assumed by the United States. The first appropriation for the payment of them was made in 1891.—Writ of spoliation, a writ obtained by one of the parties to a suit in the ecclesiastical courts, suggesting that his adversary has wasted the fruits of a benefice, or unlawfully taken them to the complainant's prejudice.

spoliative (spō'li-ā-tiv), a. [= F. spoliative; as spoliare + -ive.] Tending to take away or diminish; specifically, in med., lessening the mass of blood.

spoliator (spō'li-ā-tor), n. [= F. spoliateur = Sp. exspoliador, plunder, < L. spoliator, a plunderer, < spoliare, spoil: see spoliare.] One who commits spoliation; a despoiler; a robber.

Spoliatores (spō'li-ā-tō-rēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. spoliator, a plunderer: see spoliator.] In Macgillivray's system of classification, an order of birds, the robbers, as the jagers. [Not in use.]

spoliatory (spō'li-ā-tō-ri), a. [L. spoliare + -ory.] Consisting in spoliation; causing spoliation. Quarterly Rev., XLVII. 416.

spolium (spō'li-um), n.; pl. spolia (-ia). [ML. use of L. spolium, spoil: see spoil.] In eccles. law, the property of a beneficed ecclesiastic which could not be legally disposed of by will at death.—Jus spolii, originally, the right claimed in the middle ages by those present at the death of a beneficed ecclesiastic to seize and carry off any portable property of the deceased. This led to such scandals that finally the right was vested by papal constitutions in the church, and all spolia belong to the papal treasury.

spont, n. A Middle English form of spoon.

spondaic (spon-dā'ik), a. [OF. spondaigne, F. spondaigne = Sp. espondido = Pg. espondido = It. spondaico, < L. **spondaiens*, incorrect form of spondiacus, < Gr. σπονδαῖος, of or pertaining to a spondee, < σπονδή, a spondee: see spondee.] In anc. pros.: (a) Of or pertaining to a spondee; constituting a spondee; consisting of spondees. (b) Having a spondee in the fifth place; noting a dactylic hexameter of the exceptional form

— ∞ | — ∞ | — ∞ | — ∞ | — ∞ | — ∞ | — ∞

the fifth foot being regularly a dactyl.

spondaical (spon-dā'ik-al), a. [L. spondaic + -al.] Same as spondaic.

spondal (spon-dal), n. An obsolete erroneous form of spondyl.

spondee (spon'dō), n. [Formerly also spondia (also, as L., spondens = D. G. Dan. spondens; = Sw. sponde; < F. sponde = Sp. Pg. espondeo = It. spondeo, < L. spondens, spondens, < Gr. σπονδή, a spondee, so called as used (probably as double spondee) in hymns accompanying libations, prop. adj. (see σπός, a foot), of or pertaining to a libation, < σπονδή, a drink-offering, libation to the gods, pl. σπονδαί, a solemn treaty, a truce, < σπένδω, pour out, make a libation; root uncertain. Cf. L. spondere, answer: see sponsor.] In anc. pros., a foot consisting of two long times or syllables, one of which constitutes the thesis and the other the arsis: it is accordingly tetrasemic and isorhythmic. The spondee is principally used as a substitute for a dactyl or an anapest. In the former case it is a dactylic spondee (— for — ∞), in the latter an anapestic spondee (— ∞ for — ∞). An irrational spondee represents a trisemic foot, trochee, or iambus (— for — ∞, or — ∞ for — ∞). It is found in the even places of trochaic lines and in the odd places of iambic lines, also in iambic verses, especially as representing the initial trochee ("thesis"). A foot consisting of two spondees is called a dispondee.—Double spondee, greater spondee, in anc. pros., a foot consisting of two tetrasemic longs (— ∞), and accordingly double the magnitude of an ordinary (single) spondee (— ∞).

Spondiaceæ (spon-di-ā'sō-ō), n. pl. [NL. (Kuntz, 1824), < Spondias + -aceæ.] Same as Spondiaceæ.

Spondias (spon'di-as), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), < Gr. σπονδιὰ, a false reading of σπονδία, a tree supposed to be the bullace.] A genus of poly-petalous trees, of the order Anacardiaceæ, type of the tribe Spondiæ. It is characterized by polygamous flowers with eight or ten stamens and four or five styles which are free at the apex. There are two species, dispersed through tropical regions of both hemispheres. They bear alternate odd-pinnate leaves, often crowded at the ends of the branches, with opposite and often very taper-pointed leaflets. The small short-pedicelled flowers form spreading terminal panicles. Each flower contains four or five spreading petals and a free ovary of as many cells, which becomes in fruit a fleshy drupe with a thick stone. The leaves and bark often yield medicinal and principally astringent preparations; the fruit is often astringent and laxative; that of S. tuberosa is valued in Brazil as a remedy in fevers. The fruits of several species are known as hog-plums. S. purpurea, the purple or Spanish plum, is often cultivated in the West Indies, and is readily propagated by cuttings. S. lutea, a tree resembling the ash and reaching 40 or 50 feet, bears yellowish flower-buds, used as a sweetmeat with sugar, and a yellow oval fruit known as Jamaica plum or golden apple. S. dulcis, a similar tree abundant in most Polynesian islands, and known as Otaheite apple, yields a large yellow fruit with the smell of apples and an agreeable mild flavor, to the eye contrasting handsomely with the dark-green foliage. The tree is widely cultivated elsewhere in the tropics. A Brazilian tree, reported as S. tuberosa, produces long aerial roots which descend and form at the ground large black hollow and cellular tubers containing about a pint of water, supplying in dry weather the needs both of the tree and of travelers. S. mangifera of India is the source of a gum resembling gum arabic, known as hog-gum, and of several medicinal remedies. Its smooth yellowish-green fruit is known as wild mango, or amra, and is eaten parboiled or pickled or made into curries.

Spondiææ (spon-di'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1862), < Spondias + -ææ.] A tribe of polypetalous plants, of the order Anacardiaceæ, distinguished from the other tribe, Mangiferiææ, by an ovary with from two to five cells (instead of one), the ovules usually or always pendulous. It includes 47 genera, of which Spondias is the type. They are mainly tropical or South African, and are mostly trees with pinnate leaves. Also Spondiæææ, Spondiææ.

spondil, n. An obsolete spelling of spondyl.
spondulic (spon-dū'lik), n. [Also spondoolic, spondoolix; origin obscure.] Originally, paper money; now, any money; funds. [Slang, U.S.]
spondyl, spondyle (spon'dil), n. [Formerly also spondil, spondal, spondic; < F. spondyle, < L. spondylus, < Gr. σπόνδυλος, less correct form of σπόνδυλος, a joint of the spine, a vertebra, joint, round stone, etc.] 1. A joint, or joining of two pieces.

Great Sir, the circles of the divine providence turn themselves upon the affairs of the world so that every spondyl of the wheels may mark out those virtues which we are then to exercise. Jer. Taylor, Ductor Dubitantium, Ded.

2. A joint of the backbone; a vertebra.

A kind of rack
Runs down along the spondils of his back.
B. Jonson, Sad Shepherd, II. 2.

spondylalgia (spon-di-lal'ji-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, + ἀλγος, pain.] Pain in the spine; rachialgia.

spondylarthrit (spon'di-lir-thri'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, + ἄρθριτις, q. v.] Inflammation of the vertebral articulations.

spondylaxarthrosis (spon-di-leks-ir-thrō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, + ἐξάρθρωσις, dislocation, < ἐξ, out, + άρθρον, a joint.] Dislocation of the vertebra.

Spondylidæ<sup>1</sup> (spon-dil'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (J. E. Gray, 1826), < Spondylus + -idæ.] A family of marine bivalves, related to the Lamidæ and to the scallops, typified by the genus Spondylus; the thorn-oysters. The valves are dissimilar, the right one being the larger, and attached at the beak, the left generally flat or concave; the ligament is internal. About 70 species are known, inhabiting chiefly tropical seas. The extinct species are numerous. Formerly also Spondylidææ. See cut under Spondylus.

Spondylidææ<sup>2</sup> (spon-dil'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spondylus + -idææ.] In entom., a family of phytophagous coleopterous insects, typified by the genus Spondylis, having deeply impressed sensitive surfaces of the antennæ, and the tarsi not dilated. The family was erected by Le Conte and Horn to receive all the aberrant Cerambycidæ of Lacordaire, probably representing in the modern fauna remnants of the undifferentiated types of a former geologic age. The genera and species are few. Also Spondylit.

Spondylis (spon'di-lis), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1775), < Gr. σπόνδυλος, σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, joint: see spondyl.] A genus of phytophagous beetles, typical of the family Spondylidææ.

spondylitis (spon-di-li'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, + -itis.] Arthritis of a vertebra.—Spondylitis deformans, arthritis deformans involving the vertebra.

spondylolisthesis (spon-di-lol-is-thē'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, + ὀλίσθησις, a slipping, < ὀλισθαίνω, slip, < ὀλίσθος, slipperiness.] A displacement forward of the last lumbar vertebra on the sacrum.

spondylolisthetic (spon-di-lol-is-thet'ik), a. [L. spondylolisthesis (-et-) + -ic.] Pertaining to, of the nature of, or affected with spondylolisthesis.

spondylopathia (spon'di-lō-path'i-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, + πάθος, suffering.] Disease of the vertebra.

spondylous (spon'di-lus), a. [L. spondyl + -ous.] Of or pertaining to a spondyl; like a vertebra; vertebral.

Spondylus (spon'di-lus), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1758), < L. spondylus, < Gr. σπόνδυλος, σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, joint: see spondyl.] 1.

A genus of bivalves, representing the family Spondylidææ, formerly referred to the Ostræidæ or Pectinidææ. They are remarkable for the character of their spines and the richness of their coloring. Some are known as thorn-oysters, spring-oysters, and water-clams.

Thorn-oyster (Spondylus princeps).

2. [l. c.] An oyster of this genus.—3. [l. c.] A vertebra.
sponet, n. A Middle English form of spoon.
spong (spong), n. [Prob. a form of spong, a clasp, brooch (taken as a point, a gore ?): see sprung.] A projection of land; an irregular, narrow, projecting part of a field. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

The tribe of Judah with a narrow spong confined on the kingdom of Edom.
Fuller, Pisgah Sight, II. iv. 2. (Trench.)

sponge (spunj), n. [Formerly also spunge; < ME. sponge, spunge, spounge (= D. spongie, spous), < OF. esponge, F. éponge = Pr. esponja, esponga = Sp. esponja = It. spugna, spugna = AS. spunga = Gae. Ir. spunc, < L. sporgia, < Gr. σπογγία, also σπόγγος (Attic σπόγγος), a sponge, any spongy substance, = L. fungus, a mushroom, fungus; perhaps akin to Gr. σπογγός, spongy, porous, and to Dan. Sw. svamp, a sponge, fungus, = Icel. svöppur, a sponge, and so to Goth. swammis, a sponge, = OHG. swam, swamp, MHG. swam, swam (swamb), G. schwamm = MLG. swam, swamp, LG. swamm, swamp, a spongy, fungus: see swamp, and cf. spunk and fungus.]

1. A fixed aquatic organism of a low order, various in form and texture, composed of an aggregate of amœbiform bodies disposed about a common cavity provided with one or more inhalant and exhalant orifices (ostioles and oscules), through which water pours in and out. The proper sponge-substance is traversed by a water-vascular system or set of irrigating canals, and in nearly all cases is supported and strengthened by a skeleton in the form of horny fibers, or silicious or calcareous spicules. The streaming of the water is kept up by the vibration of cilia in the water-vascular system—that is, by the beating of flagella borne upon the individual sponge-cells. These so much resemble flagellate infusorians that some naturalists regard sponges as compound infusorians, and consequently as protozoans. Those cells which have definite form are spindle-shaped, or flask-shaped, and provided with flagella, round the base of which there may be a little rim or collar, as in those infusorians known as collar-bearing monads, or Choanoflagellata. Sponges propagate by budding or gemmation, a process involving cell-fission or ordinary division of cells. They also reproduce sexually by ova and spermatozoa. Sponge-germs resulting from fission are called gemmules. The spermatozoa are spindle-shaped. The ova are like ordinary amœbiform cells, and are usually shed into the canals and pass out of the system to be developed; in some species they develop in the substance of the parent. The embryo forms a hollow ball with a ciliated cavity, and then acquires inhalant and exhalant pores. The living tissue proper of sponges is disposed in three layers or sets of cells, as in all higher animals. These are an ectoderm, entoderm, or out-layer; an endoderm, innermost layer, or in-layer; and a mesoderm, middle layer, or mid-layer, which may be quite thick. It is from the mid-layer that the reproductive elements, and all the many forms of skeletal elements, are derived. Special sense-organs have been described in some sponges. (See entoderm and ectoderm.) Sponges as a class or phylum of animals have many technical names—as Acanthophora, because they have no entoderm or stinging-organs (compare Cnidaria); Amorphozoa, from their shapelessness, or rather their many shapes; Parazoa, from their position with respect to both Protozoa and Metazoa; Porifera, Poriferata, Porozoa, and Polystomata, from their many pores or openings (see entoderm and ectoderm); Spongia, Spongiaria, Spongiida, Spongi-zoa, etc. They are divided into various primary groups, the most tangible of which are two—the chalk-sponges, or Calcispongiae, and the fibrous and fleshy sponges, or Silicispongiae. But the leading authorities differ irreconcilably in the arrangement and nomenclature of the many orders, families, and genera they respectively adopt; and the opinion has been expressed that the sponges are not susceptible of satisfactory treatment by the ordinary methods of zoological classification. See also entoderm and ectoderm.

 2. The fibrous framework of a colony of sponge-animalcules, from which the animalcules themselves have been washed out, and from which the gritty or sandy parts of the colony, if there were any, have been taken away. See skeleton, 1 (b). The framework of sponges is of different characters in the several orders. The slime-sponges have none, or scarcely any. In the ordinary fibrous sponges the skeleton is a quantity of interlacing fibers and layers, forming an intricate network. This is further strengthened in the chalky and glassy sponges by hard spicules, either separately embedded in the general skeletal substance, called cerata, or solidified in a kind of latticework. (See Calcispongiae, Silicispongiae.) The chalk-needles or calcareous spicules are either straight or oftener rayed in three-armed or four-armed crosses. The sand-needles or silicious spicules present an extraordinary and beautiful variety. Among them are many starry figures and wheel-like forms, resembling snow-crystals; others are still more curious, in the forms of crosses, anchors, grapnels, shirt-studs, bodkins, etc. The six-rayed star is the characteristic shape in the glass-sponges. (See Iactinellida.) Sponge-spicules are named in an elaborate special vocabulary. (See sponge-spicule.) The glass-sponges have some commercial value from their beauty as objects of curiosity; but a few of the fibrous sponges are the only others out of many hundreds of species, both fossil and recent, of any economic importance. Sponges, when wetted, swell to a much greater size, and become very flexible; they are therefore used as vehicles and absorbents of water and other liquids, in wiping or cleansing surfaces, erasing marks, as from n slate, etc. See bath-sponge, Euspongia, and Hippospongia.

3. Any sponge-like substance. (a) In baking, dough before it is kneaded and formed, when full of globules of carbonic acid generated by the yeast or leaven. (b) A metal when obtained in a finely divided condition, the particles having little coherency, and the mass more or less of a spongy texture. Thus, a "metallic sponge" of iron is obtained by the reduction of brown hematite ore by cementation with charcoal in the so-called "Chenot process" for the manufacture of steel. Spongy iron is also prepared on a large scale by the reduction of various ores, and in this form is used for purifying water. Platinum-sponge may be prepared by gently heating the double chloride of platinum and ammonium. Platinum-black is a black powder not differing much in its properties from platinum-sponge, except that it is less dense; it may be made to take on the spongy character by repeated ignition in a mixture of air and n combustible gas: both are used as oxidizing agents.

4. A tool for cleaning a cannon after its discharge. The sponge used for smooth-bore guns consists of a cylinder of wood covered with sheepskin or some similar woolly fabric, and fitting the bore of the gun rather closely; this is secured to n long handle, or, for field-guns, to the reverse end of the rammer. For modern rifled guns and breech-loaders, sponges of different forms and materials have been introduced. A common form is a cylinder to which bristles are fixed, forming n cylindrical brush, the rounded end being also covered with the bristles. See ent under gun-carriage.

5. Figuratively, one who or that which absorbs without discrimination, and as readily gives up, when subjected to pressure, that which has been absorbed.—6. One who persistently lives upon others; a sycophantic or eringing dependant; a hanger-on for the sake of maintenance; a parasite.

Better a penurious Kingdom then where excessive wealth flows into the graceless and injurious hands of common sponges to the impoverishing of good and loyal men.
Milton, Reformation in Eng., II.

7. In the manège, the extremity or point of a horseshoe answering to the heel.—8. The coral, or mass of eggs, under the abdomen of a eural. [Chesapeake Bay.]—Bahama sponge, one of three species or varieties of bath-sponges procured from the Bahamas.—Burr sponge, sponge that has been burnt, used in the treatment of gonorrhea and scrofulous swellings.—Calcareous sponge, n chalk-sponge.—Crumbs-of-bread sponge, See Haliclondria.—Dog-head sponge, a kind of bath-sponge, Spongia agaricina pumelata.—Fibrous sponge, any horny sponge.—Glove-sponge, a finger-sponge; a reef-sponge.—Hardhead sponge, a kind of bath-sponge, the hardhead, Spongia dura.—Holy sponge, in the Gr. Ch., n piece of compressed sponge which the deacon uses in the office of prothesis to gather together the portions in the disk under the holy bread, and with which he wipes the disk after communion.—Honeycomb sponge, the grass-sponge, Spongia egrina ceratiformis.—Horny sponge, a fibrous or fibrillose sponge; n spongio of the group Cerata, as distinguished from n chalk-sponge or glass-sponge.—Pyrotechnical sponge. Same as anadou.—Red sponge, Microciona prolifera, the red beard of the oyster of the northern United States.—Reef-sponge, a kind of bath-sponge, Spongia effusalis, var. bulbifera, growing on the Florida reefs and in the West Indies.—Sheep-wool sponge. See sheep-wool.—Sponge tent. See tent.—Toilet-sponge, n bath-sponge of fine quality; n Turkish sponge.—To set a sponge, in baking, to leaven a small mass of dough, to be used in leavening n larger quantity.—To throw up the sponge, in  pugilism, to toss up the sponge used to freshen a fighter, in acknowledgment of his defeat; hence, in general, to acknowledge that one is conquered or beaten; submit; give up the contest or struggle. (Slang.)—Turkey cup-sponge, Spongia adriatica.—Vegetable sponge. See sponge-gourd.—Velvet sponge, n fine soft sponge of the West Indies and Florida, Spongia egrina, var. meandriformis.—Vitreous sponge, a glass-sponge.—Waxed sponge. Same as sponge tent.—Yellow sponge, zlmocca sponge. See bath-sponge. (See also boring-sponge, cup-sponge, finger-sponge, flint-sponge, glass-sponge, grass-sponge, horse-sponge, wool-sponge.)

sponge (spunj), v. ; prot. and pp. sponged, ppr. sponging. [Formerly also spunge; = D. spon-sen = F. éponger = Sp. esponjar, sponge, < LL. spongiare, wipe off with a sponge; cf. Gr. σπογγίζω, sponge; from the noun.] I. trans. 1. To cleanse or wipe with a sponge; as, to sponge the body; to sponge a slate or a cannon.

Brush thou, and spunge thy elonchs to,
 That thou that day shalt weare.

2. To wipe out with a sponge, as letters or writing; offaco; remove with a sponge; destroy all traces of: with out, off, etc.

sponge-spicule

Every little difference should not seem an intolerable blemish necessarily to be sponged out.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 10.

Specifically.—3. To dampen, as in cloth-manufacturing.—4. To absorb; use a sponge, or act like a sponge, in absorbing: generally with up: as, to sponge up water that has been spilled.

They sponged up my money while it lasted, borrowed my coals and never paid for them, and cheated me when I played at cribbage.

Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xxvii.

5. To gain by sycophantie or mean arts.
 Here went the dean, when he's to seek,
 To sponge a breakfast once a week,
Swift, Richmond Lodge and Marble Hill.

"What else have you been sponging?" said Maria. . . .
 "Sponging, my dear! It is nothing but four of those beautiful pheasants' eggs, which Mrs. Whitaker would quite force upon me." Jane Austen, Mansfield Park, x.

6. To drain; harass by extortion; squeeze; plunder.

How came such multitudes of our own nation . . . to be sponged of their plate and money?

South, Sermons, I. xii.

7. In baking, to set a sponge for: as, to sponge bread.

II. intrans. 1. To gather sponges where they grow; divo or dredge for sponges.

There were n few small open boats engaged in sponging from Apalachicola, which were not entered upon the custom-house books. Fisheries of U. S., V. ii. 824.

2. To live meanly at the expense of others; obtain money or other aid in a mean way: with on.

She was perpetually plaguing and sponging on me.
Swift, To Dr. Sheridan, April 24, 1736.

sponge-animalcule (spunj'an-i-mal'kü), n. A sponge-cell. See ent under monadiform.

sponge-bar (spunj'bär), n. A sand-bar or rock bottom on which sponges grow. [Florida.]

sponge-cake (spunj'kāk'), n. A very light sweet cake made of flour, eggs, and sugar, flavored with lemon: so called from its light, spongy substance.

sponge-crab (spunj'krab), n. A crab with which a sponge is habitually cauerisoeal, as a member of the genus Dromia. See ent under Dromia.

sponge-cucumber (spunj'kü'kum-bér), n. Same as sponge-gourd.

sponge-diver (spunj'di'vër), n. One who dives for sponges; a sponge-fisher.

sponge-farming (spunj'fär'ming), n. The industry of breeding and rearing sponges. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 428.

sponge-fisher (spunj'fish'ër), n. One who fishes for sponges, or is engaged in the sponge-fishery.

sponge-fishery (spunj'fish'ër-i), n. The process or occupation of fishing for sponges.

sponge-glass (spunj'gläs), n. 1. A bucket with a glass bottom, used in searching for sponges. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIX. 179.—2. The flint-sponge, Hyalonema mirabilis, found on the coast of Japan.

sponge-gourd (spunj'görd), n. The washing- or towel-gourd, Luffa cylindrica (L. Aegyptiaca), also L. acutangula. The netted fiber from the interior of the fruit is used for washing and other purposes, hence called vegetable sponge or dish-rag. See Luffa and strainer-rine.

sponge-hook (spunj'hük), n. See hook.

spongelet (spunj'let), n. [sponge + -let.] 1. A little sponge. Encyc. Dict.—2. In bot., same as spongiote.

sponge-moth (spunj'möth), n. The gipsy-moth. [Eng. and (recently) U. S.]

spongeous (spunj'jus), a. [sponge + -ous. Cf. spongiuous.] Same as spongy.

sponger (spunj'jer), n. [Formerly also sponnger; < sponge + -er.] 1. One who uses a sponge.

—2. A person or vessel engaged in fishing for sponges. Fisheries of U. S., V. ii. 823.—3. In cloth-manuf., a machine in which cloth is dampened previous to ironing. It has a perforated adjustable cylinder, which is filled with steam, and about which the cloth is rolled.—4. A parasitical dependant; a hanger-on for maintenance; a sponge.

Trencher-flies and spongers. Sir R. L'Estrange.

sponge-spicule (spunj'spik'ül), n. One of the calcareous or silicious spicules peculiar to sponges. They generally appear in more or less modified geometrical figures, with definite axes represented by n non-skeletal rod or axial canal, around which the lime or silica is deposited in concentric layers. There may be one such axis or several. Sponge spicules are either calcareous or silicious; according to their position and relations, they are either supporting-spicules or skeleton-spicules (megasceres), or flesh-spicules or tension-spicules (microscleses). Solurle has classified them, according to position, more elaborately into spicula autodermaia, autogastralia, basalia, etc. They are also grouped primarily according to their axes, next according to their rays, and finally ne-

the Spongiae.—2. A family of horny or fibrous sponges, typified by the genus Spongia, to which various limits have been assigned. In the most restricted sense the family is represented by such forms as the bath-sponges, and now called Eumponidae.

Spongilla (spon-jil'ä), n. [NL. (Lamarek, 1816), dim. of Spongia, the sponges: see sponge.] The only genus of fresh-water sponges, belonging to the group Fibrospongiae. The type-species is S. fluvialis, which grows on the banks of rivers and ponds.

A Small Fresh-water Sponge, Sponrilla fluviatilis, with one exhalant aperture, seen from above.

of the spongy tissue of a root-tip, from its supposed property of sucking up moisture like a sponge. Also called spongiolite.

sponge), + Albug. stone.] A fossil sponge-spiculo; one of the minute silicious elements of a sponge in a fossil state.

spongiolitic (spon<sup>u</sup>ji-ō-lit'ik), a. [spongiolite + -ic.] Of the nature of a spongiolite; containing spongiolites, or characterized by their presence: as, spongiolitic flint.

spongiopilina (spon'ji-ō-pī'lin), n. [Gr. σπογγίον, dim. of σπῳγος, sponge, + πῑλος, felt, + -ine<sup>2</sup>.] A substitute for cataplasms. It is a thick cloth into which sponge is incorporated in the weaving, in a manner analogous to that of pile-weaving, to form a uniform pile, and coated on the opposite side with rubber.

spongio-plasm (spou'ji-ō-plazm), n. [Gr. σπογγιον, dim. of σπῆγμα, sponge, + πλάσμα, anything formed or molded; see plasm.] The substance, resembling neuroglia, which supports the so-called "primitive tubules" or subdivisions of nerve-fiber containing hyaloplasm. Nansen, 1886.

The primitive tubes are the meshes in a supporting substance designated as "spongio-plasm," a substance described as similar to the neuroglia which forms the sheath of the nerve tube or fibre. Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 487.

spongioplasmic (spon'ji-ō-plaz'mik), a. [spongioplasm + -ic.] Of the nature of, or pertaining to, spongioplasm. Amer. Jour. Psychol., I, 487.

spengiose (spon'ji-ōs), a. [< L. spongiōsus: see spongiōus.] Same as spongy.

spongiozoōn (spōn'ji-ō-zō'on), n.; pl. spongiozoa (-i). [NL., < Gr. σπογγιον, a sponge, + ζῶον, an animal.] A sponge. Also spongozoōn.

spongitic (spon-jit'ik), a. [< spongitic + -ic.]
Of the nature of a fossil sponge; containing or spongioblast (spong'gō-blast), n. [Gr. σπόγγος, spengo, + βλαστός, germ.] Same as spongioblast.

Spongodiæ (spong-gō-dī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σπογγώδης, σπογγώδης, spongo-like, spongy (see spongioid), + -æ-]. An order of siphonocladaceous algae, typified by the genus Codium. They form spongy spherical or cylindrical floating masses, consisting of branched tubes.

spongoid (spong'oid), a. [Gr. σπογγειδής, σπογγώδης (also σφογγειδής, σφογγώδης), sponge-like, < σπόγγος, spongo, + εἶδος, form.] Spongi-form, in any sense; spongy.

spongological (spong-gō-lōj'ī-kal), a. [< spon- golog-y + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to spongolo-gy, or the science of sponges.

spongologist (spong-gol'ô-jist), n. [spongol-og-y + -ist.] One who is versed in the science of sponges.

spongology (spong-gol'ō-jī), n. [< Gr. σπόγγος, a sponge, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The science of sponges; the study of the Sponspongomeral (spong'gō-mēr-al), a. [← spongo- mere + -al.] Of or pertaining to a spongomere; chelonasomal, as that part of a sponge which is characterized by flagellated chambers.

spongomere (spong gō-mēr), n. [Gr. σπόγγος, a sponge, + μέρος, a part.] The upper, choanostomal part of a sponge, characterized by the presence of flagellated chambers: distinguished from hypomere. Encyc. Brit., XXII, 415.

spongozoön (spong-gō-zō'on), n. [Gr. σπγγος, sponge, + ζῷον, animal.] Samoas spongiozoön.
Huall.

sponge (spun'jil), a. [Formerly also spungy; < sponge + -y.] 1. Of the nature or character of a sponge; spongiiform or spongoid. —2. Resembling a sponge in certain particulars; soft or elastic and porous; of open, loose, compressible texture, like a bath-sponge; punky, pithy, or soft-grained, as wood; boggy or soggy, as soil; absorbent; imbibitive. See cuts under cellular and cystolith.

That sad breath his spongy lungs bestow'd.
Shak., Lover's Complaint. l. 320.

Here pills of crag, with spongy, plashy base,
To soine enrich th' uncultivated space.

34. As it wero soaked with drink; drunkon.
[Ruor.]

What not put upon
His spongy officers, who shall bear the guilt
Of our great quell? Shak. Macbeth: 1. 7. 71

4†. Moist; wet; rainy.
The banks with plow and tilled brims

Thy banks with plowed and twilled brims,
Which spongy April at thy best botrims,
To make cold nymphs chaste crowns.
Shak., Tempest, iv. 1. 65.

Spongy bones, cancellated bones; specifically, the sphenotuberculae.—Spongy cartilage. Same as elastic cartilage.

lage (which see, under elastic).—Spongy platinum, platinum-sponge. See sponge, n., 3.

spongy-pubescent (spun'ji-pu-bes'ent), a. In entom., having a very compact pubescence, resembling the surface of a sponge.

spongy-villous (spun'ji-vil'us), a. In bot., so thickly covered with fine soft hairs as to be spongy or to resemble a sponge.

sponki, n. An obsolete form of spunk.

sponent, sponnet, v. Obsolete forms of the preterit plural and past participle of spin.

sponsal (spon'sal), a. [< L. sponsalis, pertaining to betrothal or espousal, < sponsus, a betrothal: see sponse.] Relating to marriage or to a spouse. Bailey, 1731.

sponsible (spon'si-bl), a. [An aphetic form of responsible.] 1. Capable of discharging an obligation; responsible. Scott, Rob Roy, xxvi.—2. Respectable; creditable; becoming one's station.

sponsing (spon'sing), n. Same as sponson.

sponson (spon'shun), n. [< L. sponsio(n)-, a solemn promise or engagement, security, < spondere, pp. sponsus, engage oneself, promise solemnly: see sponsor.] 1. The act of becoming surety for another.—2. In international law, an act or engagement made on behalf of a state by an agent not specially authorized. Such conventions must be confirmed by express or tacit ratification.

sponsional (spon'shun-al), a. [< sponsio(n)-, + -al.] Responsible; implying a pledge. [Rare.]

sponson (spon'son), n. [Also sponsing; origin obscure.] Naut. (a), the curve of the timbers and planking toward the outer part of the wing, before and abaft each of the paddle-boxes of a steamer; also, the framework itself. (b) In a warship, a similar projecting structure, in which a gun is placed: designed to enable the gun to be trained forward and aft.—Sponson-beams, the projecting beams which contribute to form sponsons.

sponsor (spon'sgr), n. [< L. sponsor, a surety, L.L. a sponsor in baptism, < spondere, pp. sponsus, promise; cf. Gr. σπώνδα (pl. of σπώνδη), a truce, < σπένδειν, pour a libation, as when making a solemn treaty: see spondée. From L. spondere are also mt. despond, respond, correspond, spouse, espousal, etc.] 1. A surety; one who binds himself to answer for another, and is responsible for his default; specifically, one who is surety for an infant at baptism, professing the Christian faith in its name, and guaranteeing its religious education; a godfather or godmother. The custom of having sponsors in baptism is as old as the second century. See godfather.—2. [cap.] [N.L.] In entom., a genus of coleopterous insects.

sponsorial (spon-só'ri-al), a. [< sponsor + -i-al.] Of or pertaining to a sponsor.

sponsorship (spon'sor-ship), n. [< sponsor + -ship.] The state of being a sponsor.

spontaneity (spon-tā-nō'ti-ti), n. [< F. spontanéité = Sp. espontaneidad = Pg. espontaneidade = It. spontaneità, *< ML. *spontaneita(t)-s*, < L.L. spontaneus, spontaneous: see spontaneous.] 1. Spontaneous character or quality; that character of any action of any subject by virtue of which it takes place without being caused by anything distinguishable from the subject itself. Spontaneity does not imply the absence of a purpose or external end, but the absence of an external incitement or external efficient cause.

2. In biol., the fact of apparently automatic change in structure, or activity in function, of animals and plants, whereby now characters may be acquired, or certain actions performed, under no influence of external conditions or stimulus; animal or vegetable automatism. (a) The inherent tendency of an individual organism to vary in structure without reference to its conditions of environment, as when a plant or animal sports; spontaneous variability. Some of the most valuable strains of domestic animals and cultivated plants have arisen thus spontaneously. (b) The tendency to purposeless activity of the muscular system of animals, whereby they execute movements independent of external stimulus.

Such actions, though voluntary, lack recognizable motive, and appear to depend upon the tension of a vigorous nervous system refreshed by repose. Such spontaneity is notable in the great activity of children and the gambols of young animals.—Spontaneity of certain cognitive faculties. In the philosophy of Kant, the self-activity of those faculties which are not determined to act by anything in the sense-impressions on which they act. But the conception is not made very clear by Kant.

spontaneous (spon-tā'nō-us), a. [= F. spontané = Sp. Pg. espontaneo = It. spontaneo, < L.L. spontaneus, willing, *< L. *spon(t)-s*, will, only in gen. spontis and abl. sponte, of one's own will, of one's own accord.] 1. Proceeding from a conscious or unconscious internal impulse; occurring or done without the intervention of external causes; in a restricted sense, springing from one's own desire or volition, apart from any external suggestion or incitement. Of late the employment of spontaneous in the sense of 'irreflexive' or 'not controlled by a definite purpose' is creeping in from the French; but this is an objectionable use of the term.

The spontaneous grace with which these homely duties seemed to bloom out of her character.

Hawthorne, Seven Gables, v.

Now my speculation is that advantageous permanent changes are always produced by the spontaneous action of the organism, and not by the direct action of the environment.

W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 101.

A man whose nature leads him to a spontaneous fulfillment of the Divine will cannot be conceived better.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 277.

2. Growing naturally, without previous human care.

Spontaneous flowers take the place of the finished parterre.

Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xxxi.

3. Growing as native; indigenous. [Rare.]

Whence they had their Indian corn I can give no account; for I don't believe that it was spontaneous in those parts.

Beverley, Hist. Virginia, iv. § 20.

4. In biol., instinctive or automatic, as some actions of animals which depend upon no external stimulus and are performed without apparent motive or purpose; uninfluenced by external conditions, as a change in structural character. Compare spontaneity, 2. Spontaneous actions may be either voluntary, in a usual sense, as the gambols of puppies or kittens, or involuntary and quite uncontrollable by the will. Of the latter class, some are abnormal, as spontaneous (in distinction from induced) combustion, and these are also called spontaneous. Center of spontaneous rotation. See rotation.—Spontaneous axis, an axis of rotation of a body under instantaneous forces, in case there is no translation in the first instant.—Spontaneous cause, a cause that is moved to causing by the end or the object.—Spontaneous combustion. See combustion.—Spontaneous dislocation. See dislocation, 2(a).—Spontaneous energy, free energy, unrepressed and unforced.—Spontaneous evolution, in obstet., the spontaneous expulsion of the fetus in a case of shoulder presentation, the body being delivered before the head.—Spontaneous generation. See generation and abiogenesis.—Spontaneous suggestion, suggestion by the action of the laws of association, without the intervention of the will. = Syn. 1. Willing, etc. (see voluntary), instinctive, unbidden.

spontaneously (spon-tā'nō-us-li), adv. In a spontaneous manner; with spontaneity.

spontaneousness (spon-tā'nō-us-ness), n. The character of being spontaneous; spontaneity.

spontoon (spon-tōn'), n. [Formerly also espon-ton; = G. spanton, < F. spanton, espon-ton, F. dial. épon-ton = Sp. esponton = Pg. espantão, < It. spanton, spanton, a sharp point, a bill, javelin, pike, spontoon; cf. spuntare, shoot forth, break off the point, blunt; puntone, a point, < punto, a prick, a point: see point.] A kind of halberd or partizan formerly serving as the distinguishing arm for certain officers of the British infantry. Compare half-pike. Also called demi-pike.

spook (spök), n. [Also spuk; = D. spook, MD. spooche = MLG. spök, spük, L.G. spook = G. spuch (obs. except in dial. use), also spuk (after L.G.) = Sw. spöke (cf. D. spooksel, MD. spooksel, Dan. spøgelse), a spook, ghost. There is nothing to show any connection with Ir. púca, elf, sprite, = W. pucca, pueci: see puck, pug.] A ghost; a hobgoblin. [Now colloq.]

Woden, who, first losing his identity in the Wild Huntsman, sinks by degrees into the mere spook of a Suabian baron, shuffling fond of field-sports.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 118.

spook (spök), v. i. [= D. spoken = MLG. spoken = G. spuken, spucken = Sw. spöka = Dan. spöge; from the noun.] To play the spook. [Rare.]

Yet still the Now World spooked it in his veins,

A ghost he could not lay with all his pains,

Lowell, Fit Adam's Story.

spookish (spü'kish), a. [< spook + -ish.] 1. Like a spook or ghost; ghostly.—2. Given over to spooks; congenial to ghosts; haunted: us, a spookish house.—3. Affected by a sense or fear of ghosts; suggestive of the presence or agency of spooks: as, a spookish circumstance; a spookish sensation. [Colloq. in all uses.]

spooky (spö'ki), a. [< spook + -y.] Same as spookish, in any sense. [Colloq.]

spool (spöl), n. [< ME. spole (not in AS.), < MD. spoele, D. spool, a spool, quill, = MLG. spöle, L.G. spole = OHG. spnolo, spnola, MHG. spuolo, G. spule, a spool, bobbin, = Icel. spöla = Sw. Dan. spole, a spool (cf. It. spola, spnola, bobbin, OF. epolet, spindle, < Teut.); perhaps akin to Icel. spölr, a rail, a bar: see spale.] 1. A small cylinder of wood or other material (with a projecting disk at each end), upon which thread or yarn is wound; a reel.—2. The revolving metal shaft of an anglers' reel, upon which the fishing-line is wound. See cut under reel.

spool (spöl), v. t. [< spool, n.] To wind on a spool.

spool-cotton (spöl'kot'n), n. Cotton thread wound on spools.

spooler (spöl'ler), n. [< spool + -er.] One who winds, or a machine used in winding, thread or yarn on spools. Ure, Diet., IV. 122.

spool-holder (spöl'höl'dér), n. 1. A stand for one or more spools of sewing-thread, on which the spools are mounted on pins, so as to turn freely as the thread is unwound. Also spool-stand.—2. In warping, a reel on which spools are placed on skewers.

spooling-machine (spöl'ling-ma-shōn'), n. A machine for winding thread on spools.

spooling-wheel (spöl'ling-hwél), n. Same as spole, 2. Halliwel.

spool-stand (spöl'stand), n. Same as spool-holder, 1.

spoom (spüm), v. [Supposed to be a var. of spume, q. v. Cf. spoon.] I, intrans. Naut., to sail steadily and rapidly, as before the wind.

We'll spare her our main-top sail;
She shall not look us long, we are no starters.
Down with the fore-sail too! we'll spoom before her.
Fletcher, Double Marriage, II. 1.

II. trans. To cause to send, as before the wind.

Spoom her before the wind, you'll lose all else!

Fletcher (and another), Two Noble Kinsmen, III. 4.

spooming (spü'ming), p. a. Rushing before the wind: in the quotation perhaps used erroneously in the sense of 'foaming,' 'surging,' 'roaring.'

O Moon! far spooming Ocean bows to thee.

Keats, Endymion, III.

spoon (spün), n. [< ME. spoon, spone, spoon, span, < AS. spōn, a splinter of wood, chip, = OFries. spōn, span = D. spaen, spaan = MLG. spōn, L.G. spoon = MHG. spōn, G. span, a thin piece of wood, shaving, chip, = Icel. spönn, spönn = Sw. spån = Dan. spaan, a chip; root uncertain. Cf. span-new, spiek-and-span-new.] 1. A thin piece of wood; a splinter; a chip.

A type of spoons, and lots of groms

Full soon will be att a nudo in end.

Booke of Precedence (E. T. S., extra ser.), p. 41.

2. A utensil consisting of a bowl or concave part and a handle, used for conveying liquids or liquid food to the mouth. Spoons were originally of wood, later of horn or metal. They are now made usually of silver, gold, iron, or mixed metal, of wood, horn, shell, or other materials, in various sizes and shapes, and for a great variety of purposes. Compare dessert-spoon, egg-spoon, table-spoon, etc.

He must have a long spoon that must eat with the devil.

Shak., C. of E., IV. 3. 62.

3. Something wholly or in part like a spoon (def. 2) or the bowl of a spoon in shape. Specifically—(a) The blade of an oar when broad and slightly curved, or an oar with such a curved blade. (b) A bright spoon-shaped piece of metal or other substance, swiveled above hooks, used as a lure or decoy in fishing. It revolves as it is drawn through the water. (c) A piece cut from the horn of an ox or bison, in the shape of an elongated bowl of a spoon, six to eight inches in length. It is used in gold-washing, and for testing the value of any kind of detrital material or pulverized ore. (d) A club the striking-surface of which is somewhat hollowed, used in the game of golf. (e) The spoonbill or paddle-fish. (f) In ornith., the spatulate dilatation at the end of the bill of a spoon-billed bird. (g) In cotton-manuf., a weighted gravitating arm in the stop-motion of a drawing-frame. One of these is held in position by the tension of each silver, and in case the silver breaks or the arm becomes empty, and the tension is thus relieved, it falls and, actuating a belt-slitter, causes the driving-belt to slip from the fast pulley to the loose pulley, thus stopping the machine. (h) In archery, same as petticoat, 5.—Apostle's spoon. See apostle-spoon.—Bag and spoon. See bag.—Deflagrating-spoon, a small spoon of metal, upon which a substance which is to be deflagrated is subjected to the action of heat.—Eucharistic spoon. Same as tabis.—Maidenhead spoon. See maidenhead.—To be born with a silver spoon in one's mouth. See born.—Wooden spoon. (a) At Cambridge University, the student whose name stands last in the Mathematical Tripos. (b) At Yale, formerly, the student who took the last appointment at the Junior Exhibition; later, the most popular student in a class.

In bot., a spore-case; the case or sac in cryptogamous plants in which the spores, which are the analogues of the seeds of the higher or flowering plants, are produced endogenously. The sporangium receives different names, in accordance with the kind of spores produced: as, macrosporangium, microsporangium, oösporangium, zoösporangium, etc. In mosses sporangium is usually the same as capsule, but by some authors it is restricted to the spore-case or sac lining the cavity of the capsule. See spore.

2. In zool., the spore-capsule or spore-receptacle of the Myxetozoa. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 334.

Also sporange.

sporation (spō-rā'shon), n. [< spore<sup>2</sup> + -ation.] In bot., a mode of generation which consists in the interior division of the body into a mass

A, Ramified Sporocyst of Bucephalus; B, part of same, more magnified: a, outer, b, inner coat; c, d, germ-masses; C, one of these, more magnified still.

sporophyidium (spō-rō-fīd'ium), n.; pl. sporophyidia (-ī). [NL. (T. F. Allen, 1888), < spora, spore, + Gr. phēiv, produce, + -idion, dim. suffix.] In bot., in the Characeae, a term applied to the whole fruit, including the spore proper, its basal cell, and the enveloping cells. It is the same, or nearly the same, as the antheridium of Sachs and Goebel, the sporophyte of Braun, the "enveloped oogonium" of Calkovskiy, and the sporogonium of authors in general. See sporangium.

sporophyll, sporophyll (spō-rō-fīl), n. [NL. sporophyllum, < spora, spore, + Gr. phyllos, a leaf.] In bot., the leaf or leaf-like organ which bears the spores, or receptacles containing the spores, in many of the vascular cryptogams. It is usually more or less modified and unlike the normal leaves, as in the spikes of Lycopodium, Selaginella, Phlogothamnium, etc. See cuts under these words, also under Osmunda, Polypodium, and Sorus.

sporophyte (spō-rō-fīt), n. [NL. spora, spore, + Gr. phytōn, plant.] In bot., the segment or stage of the life-cycle of the higher cryptogams (Pteridophyta, Bryophyta) in which the non-sexual organs of reproduction are borne. It is a stage in what has been called the alternation of generations, and is the fern-plant, club-moss plant, etc., of popular language. It bears the spores in countless numbers. By some authors the word sporophore is used for sporophyte. Compare ophyte and ophore. See Musci.

sporophytic (spō-rō-fīt'ik), a. [< sporophyte + -ic.] In bot., belonging to, resembling, or characteristic of a sporophyte.

sporosac (spō-rō-sak), n. [NL. spora, spore, + L. saccus, sack; see sack.] 1. In Hydrozoa, a degenerate medusiform person; one of the simple generative buds or gonophores of certain hydrozoans in which the medusoid structure is not developed. Encyc. Brit., XII. 554. — 2. In Ferms, a sporocyst or redia. See sporocyst (b).

sporostegium (spō-rō-stē'ji-um), n.; pl. sporostegia (-ī). [NL., < spora, spore, + Gr. stēgion, cover, roof.] In bot., in the Characeae, the characteristic spirally twisted or furrowed shell of the oöspore. It is thick and hard, usually black or brown in color, and consists of five cells which arise from the base of the spore. It is the so-called Chara-fruit.

sporous (spō-rus), a. [< spore + -ous.] In bot., of or pertaining to a spore.

Sporozoa (spō-rō-zō'ī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σπορά, seed, + ζῷον, an animal.] 1. Mouthless parasitic ciliated protozoans, a class of Protozoa, synonymous with Gregarinida, but more comprehensive, including many organisms not ordinarily classed with the gregarines. They are parasitic, and occur in almost all animals. Most are very minute, but some attain the largest size by far known among protozoans. The Sporozoa have been divided into four subclasses, Gregarinida, Coccidida, Myxosporidia, and Sarcocystidia. Also called Cytosoa. 2. [i. e.] Plural of sporozoön.

sporozoan (spō-rō-zō'an), a. and n. [< Sporozoa + -an.] 1. a. Having the characters of the Sporozoa; pertaining to the Sporozoa.

II. n. A member of the Sporozoa.

sporozoic (spō-rō-zō'ik), a. [< Sporozoa + -ic.] Same as sporozoan.

sporozooid (spō-rō-zō'oid), n. [Gr. σπόρος, seed, + ζῷον.] In bot., a zoöspore.

sporozoön (spō-rō-zō'on), n.; pl. sporozoa (-ī). [NL.: see Sporozoa.] An individual of the Sporozoa; a sporozoan.

sporran (spor'an), n. [< Gael. sporan = Ir. sparán, a purse, pouch.] In Highland costume, the purse hanging down from the belt in front of the kilt. It is commonly of fur. In its present form, as a large and showy adjunct to the dress, it is not very old. See also cut under purse.

8. In zool. and bot., an animal or a plant, or any part of one, that varies suddenly or singularly from the normal type of structure, and is usually of transient character, or not perpetuated.

A sport is generally on individual variation of apparently spontaneous origin. The difference from the normal type is usually slight, but may be quite marked; in either case its tendency is to disappear with the individual in which it arises, though some sports repeat themselves, or may be preserved by careful selection. If perpetuated, it becomes a strain, breed, or variety. Sports are observed chiefly among domesticated animals and cultivated plants. Many of the beautiful or curious household flowers are mere sports, that are produced by high cultivation, crossing, or accident, and some valued breeds of domestic animals have arisen in like manner. Monstrous characters are sometimes acquired, but mere monstrosities or malformations are not usually called sports. Compare spontaneously, 2 (a), and freak of nature (under freak).

9. A sporting man; one who is interested in open-air sports; hence, in a bad sense, a betting man; a gambler; a blackleg. [Colloq.]

The Indian immediately started back, whilst the lion rose with a spring, and leaped towards him.

Addison, Spectator, No. 55.

(b) A lying back; the resilience of a body recovering its former state by its elasticity.

The bow well bent, and smart the spring.

Couper, Human Frailty.

2. The act or time of springing or appearing; the first appearance; the beginning; birth; rise; origin: as, the spring of mankind; the spring of the year; the spring of the morning or of the day (see dayspring). [Archaic except as in def. 3 and its figurative use.]

Men, if we view them in their spring, are at the first without understanding or knowledge at all.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, i. 6.

This river taketh sprung out of a certain lake eastward.

B. Jonson, Masque of Blackness.

So great odds there is between the Spring and Fall of Fortune.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 126.

At morning sprung and even-fall
 Sweet voices in the still air singing.

Whittier, Mogg Megone, II.

Specifically—3. The first of the four seasons of the year; the season in which plants begin to vegetate and rise; the vernal season (see season); hence, figuratively, the first and freshest period of any time or condition.

Rough winter spent,
 The pleasant spring straight draweth in ure.

Surrey, The Lover Comforteth Himself.

My hasting days fly on with full career,
 But my late spring no bud or blossom sheweth.

Milton, Sonnets, II.

4. That which springs or shoots up. (a) A sprout; shoot; branch; sapling.

Springs and plantae, any spry that growt out of any tree.

Arnold's Chron., p. 168.

This canker that eats up Love's tender spring.

Shak., Yeuus and Adonis, I. 656.

(b) A young wood; any piece of woodland; a grove; a shrubbery. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

When the spring is of two years' growth, draw part of it for quick-sets.

Evelyn, Sylva, III. viii. § 23.

(c) A rod; a switch.

For he so spareth the spring spillet he children;
 And so wrot the wise to wissun us alle.

Piers Plowman (C), vi. 139.

5. A youth; a springal.

The one his bowe and shafts, the other Spring
 A burning Teede about his head did move.

Spenser, Mulopotos, I. 292.

Cn' me nae mair Sir Donald,
 But ae sprung Donald your son.

Lizzie Lindsay (Child's Ballads, IV. 65).

6. Offspring; race.

Who on all the human spring conferred confusion.

Chapman, (Imp. Dict.)

7. Water rising to the surface of the earth from below, and either flowing away in the form of a small stream or standing as a pool or small lake. Rivers are chiefly fed, both before and after being joined by their various affluents, by underground springs, and some pools of water large enough to be called ponds or even lakes are supplied in the same way. The conditions under which springs are formed are exceedingly variable, at once as regards the quantity of water, its temperature, the amount and nature of the gaseous and solid substances which it holds in solution, and the manner in which it is delivered at the surface; hence springs are variously designated in accordance with these peculiarities, the most familiar terms used for this purpose being shallow, simple, common, or surface; hot, boiling, thermal, mineral, medicinal, and geyser, or geyser, as this kind of spring is more generally called. Shallow or surface springs ordinarily furnish water which is pretty nearly pure, can be used for drinking, and does not differ much in temperature from the mean of the locality where they occur.

They are due to the fact that the water falling on the surface in the form of rain, or furnished by melting snow, sinks to a certain depth (according as the soil and underlying rocks are more or less porous or permeable), where it is held in greater or less quantity according to the amount of rainfall and the thickness and relative position of the various permeable and impermeable formations with which it is brought in contact, but seeks under the influence of gravitation to escape, and makes its appearance at the surface when the topographical or geological conditions are favorable. Thus, a bed of gravel or sand resting on a mass of clay (the former being very permeable, the latter almost impermeable) will become saturated with water below a certain depth, the distance from the surface of the saturated sand or gravel, or the line of saturation, as it is called, varying with the climate and season. It, however, there be an adjacent ravine or valley which is cut deep enough to expose the line of junction of the permeable and impermeable formations, the water will escape along this line in greater or less quantity, giving rise to springs, which will vary in number and copiousness with the varying conditions which present themselves. The water of such springs, not having descended to any great depth, will not vary much in temperature from the mean of the locality. Very different are the conditions in the case of thermal or hot springs, which may have any temperature up to boiling, and of which the water may have been heated either by coming from great depths or by contact with volcanic rocks; hence thermal springs are phenomena very characteristic of volcanic and geologically disturbed or faulted regions, and those hot springs which are of the geyser type (see geyser) are most interesting from the scenic point of view. The medicinal properties and curative effects of various hot springs are of great practical importance; and many such springs, in Europe and the United States, are places much resorted to by invalids and pleasure-seekers. The variety of constituents, both solid and gaseous, held in solution by different hot springs is very great. From the medicinal point of view, springs are variously class-

(b) A crack in a mast or yard, running obliquely or transversely. (c) A line made fast to the bow or quarter of a ship, in order to pull the head or stern in any required direction. (d)

spring-gun (spring'gun), n. A gun which is discharged by the stumbling of a trespasser upon it, or against a wire connected with the trigger; also, a gun similarly set for large animals, as bears or wolves.

spring-haas (spring'hâs), n. [< S. African D. spring-haas, < spring (= E. spring) + haas, a hare, = E. hare: see spring and hare.] The Cape jumping-hare, Pedetes caper, a kind of jerboa, of the family Dipodidae. See cut under Pedetes.

spring-halt (spring'hâlt), n. [Also, corruptly, spring-halt; < spring + halt.] An involuntary convulsive movement of the muscles of either hind leg in the horse, by which the leg is suddenly and unduly raised from the ground and lowered again with unnatural force; also, the nervous disorder on which such movements depend, and the resulting gait.

One would take it,
That never saw 'em pace before, the spavin
Or springhalt reign'd among 'em.

Shak., Hon. VIII., l. 3. 13.

spring-hammer (spring'ham'er), n. A machine-hammer in which the blow is partly or wholly made by a spring to which tension has been imparted by mechanism during the lift of the hammer-head. In some hammers the spring is a volume of confined and compressed air. In the accompanying cut a is the anvil-block; b, anvil; c, frame; d, guides for hammer; e, piston-rod; f, cylinder; g, hammer; h, crank (driven by the pulley i) which lifts the hammer, at the same time compressing the air in the air-spring cylinder j; k, idler-pulley which tightens the driving-belt l when pressed against the belt by the action of the rock-lever m, the rod n, and the foot-lever or treadle o—the rock-lever l being pivoted to the frame at n, while the treadle is pivoted to it at p. Pressure upon the treadle by the foot tightens the belt, and the hammer is then raised. The treadle is then relieved from pressure, the belt is slackened on the pulley i, and the compressed air, acting on the piston, delivers the blow, the belt then slipping easily over the pulley i.

Spring-hammer.

spring-hanger (spring'hang'er), n. A U-shaped strap of iron serving to support the end of a semi-elliptical car-spring.

spring-head (spring'hed), n. 1. A fountain-head; a source.

Water will not ascend higher than the level of the first spring-head from whence it descendeth.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, l.

2. A clutch, button, or other connecting device at the end of an elliptic carriage-spring.

spring-headed (spring'hed'), a. Having heads that spring afresh. [Rare.]

Spring-headed Hydres, and sea-shouldring Whales.

Spenser, F. Q., II. xii. 23.

spring-hook (spring'hûk), n. 1. In locomotives, a hook fixing the driving-wheel spring to the frame.—2. A latch or door-hook having a spring-catch for keeping it fast in the staple.—3. A fish-hook set like a spring-trap, with a supplementary hook, which, on being released, fixes itself in the fish; a snap-hook. Also called spear-hook.

spring-house (spring'hous), n. A small building constructed over a spring or brook, where milk, fresh meat, etc., are placed in order to be kept cool in or near the running water. [U. S.]

As I was a-settin' in the spring-house, this mornin', a-workin' my butter, I says to Dinah, "I'm goin' to carry a pot of this down to Miss Seudder."

II. B. Stowe, Minister's Woolg, iv.

springiness (spring'i-nes), n. 1. The state or property of being springy; elasticity.

The air is a thin fluid body endowed with elasticity and springiness, capable of condensation and rarefaction.

Bentley.

2. The state of abounding with springs; wetness; sponginess, as of land.

springing (spring'ing), n. [< ME. springing, springyng; verbal n. of spring, v.] 1. The act or process of leaping, arising, issuing, or proceeding; also, growth; increase.

The Foo out of a welle smal

Takeh his first springing and his sors.

Chaucer, Prolog. to Clerk's Tale, l. 49.

Thou visitest the earth, and waterest it. . . Thou makest it soft with showers; thou bleesest the springing thereof.

Ps. lxx. 10.

2. In arch., the point from which an arch springs or rises; also, a springer.

springing (spring'ing), p. a. Liable to arise; contingent; as, springing uses. See usc.

springing-beetle (spring'ing-bû'tl), n. Same as spring-beetle.

springing-course (spring'ing-kôrs), n. See course.

springing-hairs (spring'ing-hârz), n. pl. The locomotory cilia of some infusorians, as the Halteria, by means of which these animalcules skip about.

springing-line (spring'ing-lîn), n. The line from which an arch springs or rises; the line in which the springers rest on the imposts, and from which the rise or versed sine is calculated.

springing-time (spring'ing-tim), n. [< ME. springing time; < springing + time.] The time of the new growing of plants; spring-time; spring.

[The first age of man innocent & light,
The springyng tyme clepe "ver".

springing-tool (spring'ing-tôl), n. In iron-working, same as hanging-tool.

springing-wall (spring'ing-wâl), n. In building, a buttress.

spring-jack (spring'jak), n. In teleg., a device for inserting a loop in a line-circuit. It usually consists of a plug to be inserted between two spring-contacts, the ends of the loop being joined to metallic strips fixed to the opposite sides of the insulating plug. If the latter is entirely of insulating material, it becomes a spring-jack cut-out.

spring-latch (spring'lach), n. A latch that snaps into the keeper after yielding to the pressure against it. See cuts under latch.

springle (spring'l), n. [= D. G. sprengel, a noose, snare, springe, = Sw. spränkla, a springle, = Dan. sprinkel, tressis; a dim. of spring, springe, in similar senses: see spring, springe<sup>2</sup>.] 1. A springe.

They [woodcocks] arriue first on the north coast, where almost euerlo hedge serueth for a roade and euerle plash-oote for springles to take them.

2. A rod about four feet in length, used in thatching. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

springless (spring'les), a. [< spring + -less.] Lacking springs or spring. (a) Having no springs, or natural fountains of water. (b) Lacking elastic springs: as, a springless wagon.

springlet (spring'let), n. [< spring + -let.] A little spring; a small stream.

But yet from out the little hill

Oozes the slender springlet still.

Scott, Marmion, vi. 37.

spring-ligament (spring'lig'a-mont), n. The inferior calcaneoscaphoid ligament of the sole of the foot, connecting the os calcis or heel-bone with the scaphoid, supporting the head of the astragalus, and forming part of the articular cavity in which the latter is received.

springlike (spring'lik), a. Resembling spring; characteristic of spring; vernal: as, springlike weather; a springlike temperament.

There the last blossoms spring-like pride unfold.

Savage, Wanderer, v.

spring-line (spring'lîn), n. In milit. engin., a line passing diagonally from one pentoon of a bridge to another.

spring-lock (spring'lok), n. A lock which fastens itself automatically by a spring when the door or lid to which it is attached is shut. Also called latch-lock.

spring-mattress (spring'mat'res), n. See mattress and spring-bed.

spring-net (spring'net), n. A bird-net which can be shut by means of a spring and trigger; a flap-net. A net of similar form is used for trapping rabbits.

spring-oyster (spring'oîs'tér), n. A thorn-oyster. See cut under Spondylus.

spring-padlock (spring'pad'lok), n. A padlock which locks automatically by means of a spring when the hasp is pressed into its seat.

spring-pawl (spring'pâl), n. A pawl actuated by a spring.

spring-plank (spring'plangk), n. A transverse timber beneath a railway truck-boiler, forming a support for the bolster-springs. E. H. Knight.

spring-pole (spring'pôl), n. A pole fastened so that its elasticity can be used for some mechanical purpose.—Spring-pole drilling, a method of boring holes in rock for oil, water, or any other purpose, in which the rods and drill are suspended from a spring-pole, which by its elasticity lifts them up after every stroke. The down motion is effected by hand-power, or sometimes a stirrup is added to enable the driller to use his feet. Prospecting-holes of from two to three inches in diameter can be bored with this simple apparatus to the depth of one or two hundred feet, or even more.

spring-punch (spring'punch), n. A punch which has a spring to throw it back after it has been driven down by pressure. This is usually done only in quick-working punches which are driven by the blows of a hammer, or in hand-punches such as those used by shoemakers, railway conductors, etc.

spring-searcher (spring'sér'chér), n. A tool having steel prongs projected by springs, used to detect defects in a cannon-bore.

spring-shackle (spring'shak'l), n. 1. A shackle closed by a spring.—2. A shackle connecting two springs, or connecting a spring to a rigid part: used in vehicles, etc.

spring-valve (spring'valv), n. 1. A valve fitted with a spring, which holds it to its seat except when it is opened by extraneous force.—2. A safety-valve with which is connected a spring-balance, graduated to any required number of pounds, and acting as a check on the valve until the determined pressure is attained. See out under safety-valve.

spring-wagon (spring'wag'on), n. A wagon the bed of which rests on springs.

spring-water (spring'wät'er), n. Water issuing from a spring: in contradistinction to river-water, rain-water, etc.

Spare Diet, and Spring-water clear, Physicians hold are good.
Prior, Wandering Pilgrim.

spring-weir (spring'wēr), n. A kind of weir arranged to drop to the bottom at low water, and allow the fish to pass over it with the incoming tide, while at high water it is lifted up. It is worked from the shore by means of capstans and ropes, so that it forms an impassable barrier to the fish, which are retained as the tide passes out, and are thus taken in large numbers. [Maline.]

spring-worm (spring'wērm), n. A pin-worm, as Oxyuris vermicularis; a small threadworm. See out under Oxyuris.

springwort (spring'wört), n. [< ME. spring-wurt, springwurt; < spring + wort.] In European folk-lore, a plant to which various magical virtues were attributed, among them that of drawing down the lightning and dividing the storm: identified by Grimm with the caperattributive use of the older E. name of Prussia;

< ME. Spruce, a variant, with unorig. initial S-, of Pruce, Prus, Prusys (also in comp. Prusland, Prusysland), < OF. Pruce (F. Prusse), *< ML.
Prussia* (G. Preussen = D. Pruissen = Sw. Dan.
Preussen), Prussia: see Prussian. The name
Spruce, Prussia, was not only used in the phrase
Spruce leather, or Pruce leather, but also in connection with fashionable apparel ("apparelreyled after the manner of Prussia or Spruce," Hall, Henry VIII., an. 1), and also allusively, somewhat like Cockayne, as a land of luxury ("He shall live in the land of Spruce, milke and hony flowing into his mouth sleeping"—Chapman, "Masque of Middle Temple and Lincoln's Inn"). Hence prob. the adj. spruce<sup>2</sup>. Cf.

spruce<sup>2</sup> (sprōs), a. [Sc. also sprush; prob. an extended use of spruce<sup>1</sup>, in allusion to fashionable apparel: see spruce<sup>1</sup>. This adjective cannot be derived, as some attempt to derive it, from ME. prouis, preus, < OF. proz, F. preux, brave, etc. (see proue<sup>2</sup>), or from E. dial. sprugl or sprack.] 1. Smart in dress and appearance; affecting neatness or dapperness, especially in dress; trim; hence often, with a depreciatory force, dandified; smug.

Now, my spruce companions, is all ready, and all things neat? Shak., T. of the S., iv. 1. 116.

Be not in so neat and spruce array
As if thou mean'st to make it holiday.
Beaumont, Remedy of Love.

A spruce young spark of a Learned Clerk.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 227.

2. Over-fastidious; excessively nice; finical.

Taffeta phrises, silken terms precise,
Three-piled hyperboles, spruce affectation.

The niceties of a spruce understanding.
Jer. Taylor, Sermons, III. iii.

=Syn. Foppish, etc. (see finical), smart, jaunty, nice, dan-dyish.

spruce<sup>2</sup> (sprōs), v.; pret. and pp. spruced, ppr.
sprucing. [< spruce<sup>2</sup>, a.] I. trans. 1. To make spruce; trim or dress so as to present a smart appearance: sometimes followed by up.

Salmacis would not be seen of Hermaphroditus till she had spruced up her self first. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 335.

2. To brown, as the crust of bread, by heating the oven too much. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

II. intrans. To become spruce; assume or affect an air of smartness in dress: often followed by up. [Chiefly colloq.]

But two or three years after, all of a sudden, Dench, he seemed to kind o' spruce up and have a deal o' money to spend. H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 193.

spruce<sup>3</sup> (sprōs), n. [An abbr. of spruce-fir.]
A coniferous tree of the genus Picea; a spruce-fir. The species are handsome evergreens of a conical habit, often of great economic worth. Some related trees are also called spruce. See specific names below.

Brussels Sprouts (Brassica oleracea, var. gemmifera).

For masts, &c., those [firs] of Prussia which we call spruce and Norway are the best. Evelyn, Sylva, I. xxii. § 2.

Black spruce, Picea nigra, a species of spruce growing 50 or 60 feet high, found through British America, the northern United States, and in the Alleghenies to North Carolina. Its light soft wood is largely made into lumber, and is used in construction, in shipbuilding, for piles, etc. An essence of spruce is obtained from its branches, used in making spruce-beer. — Blue spruce. Same as white spruce (c). — Double spruce, the black spruce. — Douglas spruce, Pseudotsuga Douglasii. See Pseudotsuga, and Oregon pine (under pine). — Essence of spruce, a thick liquid with a bitterish acidulous astringent taste, obtained by boiling and evaporation from the young branches of the Norway spruce, the black spruce, and perhaps other species. It is used in making spruce-beer. — Hemlock spruce. See hemlock-spruce. — Himalayan or Indian spruces, Picea Morinda, of the temperate Himalayas and Afghanistan, a tree 150 feet high, affording a pale straight-grained timber, durable only under shelter. — New Zealand spruce, the imou-pino, or red pine, Dacrydium cupressinum, a beautiful tree with long weeping branches. From the young growth Captain Cook made an antiseptic spruce-beer. See imou-pine. — Norway spruce, Picea excelsa, a spruce of middle and northern Europe and northern Asia. It attains a height of 150 feet, forms extensive forests, endures severe cold, and on mountains reaches an elevation of 4,500 feet. Its tough and elastic wood is the white deal of Europe, excellent for building, furniture, masts, spars, etc. It is the source of Burgundy pitch. See pitch. — Oil of spruce, oil of hemlock. — Red spruce, a stunted variety (P. rubra) of the black spruce, growing in swamps. — Single spruce. Same as white spruce (a). — Spruce bud-louse, an aphid of the subfamily Cheremidae, Adelges abietis, which deforms the end-shoots of the spruce in the United States, producing large swellings sometimes mistaken for the natural cones. In Europe A. coccineus and A. strabus have the same habit. — Spruce bud-worm, the larva of a tortricid moth, Tortrix fumiferana, which eats the end-buds of the spruce in northeastern parts of the United States, especially in Maine. Other spruce bud-worms are the reddish-yellow, Stegomyia rufescens; the black-headed, Tetralix variaria; and the red, Gelechia obtusipennis. — Spruce cone-worm, the larva of a plume moth, Pinipictis reticulata, which bores the fresh young cones of spruces in the United States. — Spruce leaf-hopper, an oblong shining-black leaf-hopper, Athyas abietis, which punctures spruce-needles in May and June in the United States. — Spruce plume-moth, Oxyptilus nigrocaudatus. Its larva feeds on spruce, and it is the only member of the Pterophoridae known to infest any conifer. — Spruce saw-fly, a common saw-fly, Lophyrus abietis, whose pale-green larva defoliate spruce, fir, pine, and cedar in the United States, but especially spruce. — Spruce timber-beetle, Xyloterus bicinctus, the most injurious of several scolytids which attack the spruce in the United States. Others are Xyloterus (or Xyleborus) celatus, Crypturgus atomus, Pityophthorus matricarius, and Hylurgus pinifex. — Tide-land spruce, Picea Sitkensis, a spruce found from Alaska to California near the coast, best developed near the mouth of the Columbia river, where for 50 miles in each direction it forms a forest-belt 10 or 15 miles wide. It grows from 140 to 180 feet high, and furnishes an important light, soft, and straight-grained timber, largely manufactured into lumber, and used for construction, inside finish, cooperage, dunnage of vessels, etc. Sargent. — White spruce. (a) Picea alba, the most important timber-tree of subarctic America, extending into northern New England, and at its best in northern Montana. Its timber in commerce is not distinguished from that of the black spruce. Also single spruce. (b) P. engelmanni, the most valuable timber-tree of the central Rocky Mountain region, where it forms extensive forests. Its wood is of a white or pale-yellow color, light and soft, in Colorado affording lumber, fuel, and charcoal. The bark is rich in tannin, which is locally utilized. (c) P. pungens, a rare and local mountain species of the western United States. Also called blue spruce, Colorado blue spruce. Sargent.

Branchlet, with Cone, of Norway Spruce (Picea excelsa).

spruce (sprūs), n. An abbreviation of spruce-beer. [Colloq.]

"Come, friend," said Hawk-eye, drawing out a keg from beneath a cover of leaves, . . . "try a little spruce; 'twill . . . quicken the life in your bosom."
J. F. Cooper, Last of Mohicans, vi.

spruce-beer (sprūs'ber), n. [A partial translation and accommodation (as if 'beer of spruce' or spruce-fir (< spruce<sup>3</sup> + beer<sup>1</sup>), or as if Spruce beer, i. o. 'beer of Spruce' or Prussia (< spruce, or Pruce, Prussia (see spruce<sup>1</sup>), + beer<sup>1</sup>)) of G. sprossen-bier, lit. 'sprouts-beer', obtained from the young sprouts of the black spruce-fir, < sprossen, pl. of spross, a sprout (= E. sprout), + bier = E. beer: see sprout<sup>1</sup> and beer<sup>1</sup>.] A beer made from the leaves and small branches of the spruce-fir, or from the essence of spruce, boiled with sugar or molasses, and fermented with yeast. There are two kinds, the brown and the white, of which the latter is considered the better, as being made with white sugar instead of molasses. Spruce-beer is an agreeable and wholesome beverage, and is useful as an antiscorbutic.

spruce-duff (sprūs'duf), n. Duff formed by spruce-trees. See duff, 3. [Local, U. S.]

spur (spēr), n. [ME. spure, spore, < AS. spora, a spur (hand-spore, 'hand-spur', talon), = MD. spore, D. spoor, a spur, also a track, = MLG. spore = OHG. sporo, MHG. spore, spor, G. sporn = Isol. spori = Sw. sporre = Dan. spore, spur (cf. OF. esporon, esperon, F. éperon = Pr. espero = OSp. esporon, Sp. espolon = Pg. esporio = It. sperone, sprone (> E. obs. speron), also without the suffix, OSP. espuera, Sp. espuela = Pg. espóra, a spur, < OHG. sporo, acc. sporon); orig. 'kicker', from its use on the heel; from the root of spurn, v. Cf. speer, spoor, speron, from the same ult. root.] 1. A pointed instrument worn on the heel by a horseman to goad the horse. The earliest medieval spurs were without rowels (see prick-spur, goad-spur); another form had a ball from which a short point projected, and was called the ball-and-spoke spur. The rowel was first introduced in the thirteenth century, but was not common until the beginning of the fourteenth. The spurs of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries were sometimes of extraordinary length on account of the projection of the steel flanchers which kept the heel far from the horse's side. See rowel-spur (with cut), also cut under prick-spur.

With-out spores other spere spakliche he loket.
Piers Plowman (B), xviii. 12.

Mount thou my horse, and hide thy spurs in him,
Till he have brought thee up to yonder troops,
And here again. Shak., J. C., v. 3. 15.

2. Anything which goads, impels, or urges to action; incitement; instigation; incentive; stimulus: used in this sense in the phrase on or upon the spur of the moment—that is, on a momentary impulse; suddenly; hastily; impromptu.

What need we my spur but our own cause
To prick us to redress? Shak., J. C., II. 1. 123.

If you were my counsel, you would not advise me to answer upon the spur of the moment to a charge which the basest of mankind seem ready to establish by perjury.
Scott, Guy Mannering, lvi.

3. Some projecting thing more or less closely resembling a horseman's spur in form or position. (a) A root of a tree; a large lateral root.

By the spurs pluck'd up
The pine and cedar. Shak., Tempest, v. 1. 47.

Yet is thy root sincere, sound as the rock,
A quarry of stout spurs and knotted fangs.
Comper, Yardley Oak, I. 117.

(b) pl. Short small twigs projecting a few inches from the trunk. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.] (c) A snag; a spine; specifically, in herpet.: (1) An anal spur. (2) A calcar of some frogs. (d) In entom., a spine or stiff bristle on the leg. (e) In ornith.: (1) A horny modification of the integument of a bird's foot, forming an outgrowth of the nature of a claw, usually sharp-pointed and supported on a bony core, and used as a weapon of offense and defense; a calcar. Such a spur differs from a claw mainly in not ending a digit, but being an offset from the side of the metatarsus; it is also characteristic of though not confined to the male, and is therefore a secondary sexual character. It is familiar as occurring on the shank of the domestic cock and other gallinaceous birds, and is sometimes double or treble, as in Pavo bicalcaratus and in the genera Galloperdix, Ithaginis, and Polyplectron. See cuts under calcarate, Galloperdix, Ithaginis, pea-fowl, Polyplectron, Rasores, and tarsometatarsus. (2) A similar horny outgrowth on the pinion-bone of the wing in various birds, resembling a claw, but differing in being a lateral offset not terminating a digit. It occurs in certain geese, plovers, pigeons, and juncos, and is double in the screamer. See cuts under jacana, Palamedea, and spur-winged. (f) In sporting, a gaff, or sharp piercing or cutting instrument fastened upon the natural spur of a game-cock in the pit. (g) In mammal., the calcar of some bats. (h) In phys. geog., a ridge or line of elevation subordinate to the main body or crest of a mountain-range; one of the lower divisions of a mountain-mass, when this, as is frequently the case, is divided by valleys or gorges. See mountain-chain.

The ground-plan of the latter massif (Mont Blanc) is one long ridge, which, except of the two extremities, preserves a very uniform direction, and throws out a series of long spurs to the north-west.

Donney, The Alpine Regions, p. 25.

(i) A climbing-iron used in mounting telegraph-poles and the like. (j) In carp., a brace connecting or strengthening a post and some other part, as a rafter or cross-beam. (k) In arch., any offset from a wall, etc., as a buttress: specifically, the claw or griffe projecting from the torus at each of the angles of the base of early pointed medieval columns. (l) In bot., a calcar; a slender hollow projection from some part of a flower, as from the calyx of columbine and larkspur and the corolla of violets. It is usually nectariferous, being the nectary (nectarium) of Linnaeus. The term is also rarely applied to a solid spur-like process. See also cuts under nectary, columbine, and Delphinium. (m) In fort., a wall that crosses a part of the rampart and joins it to an exterior work; also, a tower or blockhouse placed in the outworks before the port. (n) In ship-building: (1) A shore or piece of timber extending from the bilgeways, and fayed and bolted to the bottom of the ship on the stocks. (2) A curved piece of timber serving as a half beam to support the deck where a whole beam cannot be placed. (3) A heavy timber extended from a pier or wharf against the side of a ship to prevent the ship from striking against the pier. (o) In hydraul. engin., a wing-dam, or projection built out from a river-bank to deflect the current. (p) On nesting, a fin, or projection of waste metal. (q) A small piece of refractory clay ware with one or more projecting points, used in a kiln to support or separate articles in a saggar during firing, and to prevent the pieces from adhering to the saggar and to each other. Also called stilt. E. H. Knight.

(r) In on auger, a projecting point on the edge, which makes the circular cut, from which the chip is removed by the flp. E. H. Knight. See cut under auger. (s) The prong on the arms of some forms of patent anchors, for the purpose of catching on the bottom and making the fluke bite or take hold more quickly. See cut under anchor.

(t) In printing, a register-point. [Eng.] (u) In anat., the angle at which the arteries leave a cavity or trunk. Dun- glison. (v) In mining, a branch of a vein; a feeder or dropper.—Anal spurs. See anal.—Hot o' the spur. See hot.—Order of the Golden Spur, an old order of the papal court, of which the badge was a Maltese cross with rays between the arms, and having a small spur hanging from it. Having sunk into neglect, it was superseded in 1841 by the Order of St. Sylvester.—Scotch spur, in her., a bearing representing a prick-spur without rowel.—Spur-pepper. See Capsicum.—Spur system, in hort., a method of pruning grape-vines in which the ripened wood of the preceding season is cut back close to the old stem or arm, so as to leave spurs bearing one, two, or three buds, the spurs being so selected as to provide for shoots of equal distances. The growing shoots are trained to a position at right angles to the arm, whether this is horizontal or vertical, and are topped after the formation of one, two, or three bunches of grapes upon each.—Spur valerian. See Centranthus.—To win one's spurs, to gain a title to knighthood (because spurs were given as a reward for gallant or valiant action); hence, to establish a title to honorable recognition and reward.—With spur and yard, with whip and spur—that is, at once.

Trusteth well that I
Wol be hire champion with spore and yerde,
I raughte noght though nile hire foots it herde.
Chaucer, Troilus, II. 1427.

spur (spēr), v.; pret. and pp. spurred, ppr. spurring. [ME. sporen, sperren, sperien, spurien = OHG. sporōn, MHG. sporen, sporn, G. spornen = Sw. sporra = Dan. spore, spur; from the noun. Cf. AS. spyrian, spirian, sperian, etc., track, follow out, E. speer: see speer.] I. trans. 1. To prick or rasp with the point or rowel of a spur.

He sporyd his hors, and theder toke the way.
Generydes (E. E. T. S.), I. 127

Forms of Spurs.
a, knight's spur (14th or 15th century); b, brass spur (Henry IV.); c, long-necked brass spur (Edward IV.); d, long-necked brass spur (Henry VII.); e, steel spur (Henry VIII.).

He spurred the old horse, and he held him tight.
Kingsley, The Knight's Leap.

2. Figuratively, to urge or incite.

Remember yet, he was first wrong'd, and honour
Spurr'd him to what he did.
Fletcher (and another), Love's Cure, i. 3.

3. To hasten. [Rare.]

Lovers break not hours,
Unless it be to come before their time;
So much they spur their expedition.
Shak., T. G. of V., v. 1. 6.

4. (a) To fasten spurs to, as a horseman's boot, or a solleret. (b) To furnish with spurs, as a rider: as, booted and spurred; to furnish with a spur or gaff, as a game-cock.—5. To prop; support. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

II. intrans. 1. To prick one's horse with the spur; ride in haste.

Now spurs the lated traveller apace
To gain the timely inn.
Shak., Macbeth, iii. 3. 7.

2. Figuratively, to press forward.

Some bold men, though they begin with infinite ignorance and error, yet, by spurring on, refine themselves.
Greiv.

spur-blind, a. [Appar. a var. of purblind, simulating spur.] Purblind.

Madame, I crave pardon, I am spur-blind, I could scarce see.
Lyly, Sapho and Phao, ii. 2.

spur-bunting (spér'buu'ting), n. A spur-heeled bunting; a lark-bunting.

spur-flower (spér'flou'ér), n. A plant of the genus Centranthus.

spur-fowl (spér'foul), n. A gallinaceous bird of the genus Gallinago. There are several Indian and Ceylonese species. See ent under Gallinago.

spur-gall (spér'gál), n. A sore or callous and hairless place, as on the side of a horse, caused by use of the spur.

spur-gall (spér'gál), v. t. [< spur-gall, n.] To make a spur-gall on, as a horse.

And yet I bear a burthen like an Ass,
Spur-gall'd and tyrd by hauncing Bullingbrooke.
Shak., Rich. II. (folio 1623), v. 5. 91.

spur-gally (spér'gá'li), a. [< spur-gall + -y.] Spur-galled; wretched; poor. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

spurge (spérj), v. [< ME. sporgen, spourgen, spourgen, < OF. espurger, espurger = Sp. Pg. expurgar = It. spurgare, < L. expurgare, purgo, cleanse: see expurgate, and cf. purge.] I. trans. To purge; cleanse; rid.

Of flies men now hem weyl spurge.
Rob. of Brunne, Handlyng Synne, l. 10918.

II. intrans. To purge; froth; emit froth; especially, to work and cleanse itself, as ale.

By reason that . . . the ale and byere haue palled, and were nought by cause such ale and biero hatho taken wynde in spuryng.
Arnold's Chron., p. 65.

spurge (spérj), n. [< ME. sporgen, spourgen, < OF. espurger, espurger, spurge, < OF. espurger, purge: see spurge.] A plant of the genus Euphorbia. Several species have special names, chiefly used in books; a few related or similar plants also are called spurge. Exotic species are better known as euphorbias.—Alleghany-mountain spurge. See Pachysandra.—Branched spurge, a rubiaceous shrub, Ernodea littoralis, of the sea-shores of the West Indies and Florida, a prostrate smooth plant with four-angled branches, and yellowish flowers sessile in the upper axils.—Caper-spurge, Euphorbia Lathyris, a smooth glaucous herb native in southern Europe and western central Asia, cultivated in gardens, thence sometimes escaping. It is singular in the genus for its opposite leaves, and has a four-rayed, then forking, umbel. Its young fruit is sometimes substituted for capers, and its seeds contain an oil formerly used in medicine. Also wild caper, mole-trec, and myrtle-spurge.—Cypress-spurge, a common garden plant, Euphorbia Cyparissias, with tufted stems and yellowish inflorescence, cultivated for its foliage, which consists of crowded linear leaves suggesting cypress. It is a native of Europe, running wild in the eastern United Flowering Spurge (Euphorbia corollata).

a, a leaf; b, a flower-cluster of five male and one female flower; c, flower-cluster, but younger, showing the cup-like base; d, part of the involucre, showing the gland at its base; e, a male flower; f, the fruit, consisting of three carpels.

States.—Flowering spurge, a conspicuous species, Euphorbia corollata, of eastern North America, a rather slender plant 2 or 3 feet high, with an umbel of about five forks, the rays repeatedly forking into twos or threes. The involucre has five white appendages appearing like petals. The root has properties similar to those of the hyssop-spurge. Also (with other species) called milk-weed.—Hyssop-spurge, the purple spurge, Euphorbia Peplus, a European maritime species spreading flint on the sand.—Indian tree-spurge. Same as milk-hedge.—Ipecac-spurge, ipecacuanha-spurge, Euphorbia Ipecacuanha, found in the United States from Connecticut to Florida, a plant with many low stems from a long perpendicular root. The root has an active emetic and purgative property, but in large doses tends to produce excessive nausea and purging, and is inferior to true ipecac.—Irish spurge. See makinboy.—Leafy spurge, Euphorbia Esula, an Old World species resembling the cypress-spurge, but larger, with commonly lanceolate leaves.—Myrtle-spurge. See caper-spurge.—Petty spurge, a low branching European species, Euphorbia Peplus.—Purple spurge. See hyssop-spurge.—Sea-spurge, or seaside spurge, Euphorbia Paralias, of European sea-shores.—Slipper-spurge, the slipper-plant. See Pedicularis.—Spotted spurge, a prostrate American species, Euphorbia maculata, with a dark spot on the leaf; also called milk-purslane. The large spotted spurge is E. Preslii, sometimes called black spurge or purslane. See purslane.—Spurge hawk-moth, a handsome sphinx, Delilephila euphorbiae, whose larva feeds on the sea-spurge; an English collector's name.—Sun-spurge, Euphorbia Helioscopia, an erect annual four inches high, whose flowers follow the sun. Also called cat's-milk, little-good (Scotland), and wartwort (Prov. Eng.).—Wood-spurge, Euphorbia amygdaloides, of Europe and western Asia.***

spur-gear (spér'gër), n. Same as spur-gearing.
spur-gearing (spér'gër'ing), n. Gearing in Spur-gearing.

which spur-wheels are employed. See gearing, 2.

spurge-creeper (spérj'kré'për), n. A nottle-creeper; same as nettle-bird.

spurge-flax (spérj'flaks), n. A shrub, Daphne Guiddina, a native of southern Europe; so called from its aërid property and fibrous bark.

spurge-laurel (spérj'la'rel), n. A laurel-like shrub, Daphne Laureola, of southern and western Europe. It has an aërid property suggesting spurge; its fibrous bark is utilized for paper-making.

spurge-nettle (spérj'not'l), n. A plant, Jatropha urens. See Jatropha.

spurge-olive (spérj'ol'iv), n. The mezeroon. spurgewort (spérj'wërt), n. [< lat. ME. spurge-woort: see spurge and wort.] 1. Any plant of the order Euphorbiaceae. Lindley.—2. The fetid iris, Iris fatidissima.

spurging (spér'jng), n. [Verbal n. of spurge, v.] Purging. B. Jonson, Masque of Queens.

spur-hawk (spér'hák), n. A dialectal form of spurhawk for sparrow-hawk. [Eng.]

spur-heeled (spér'hëld), a. In ornith., having a very long straightened hind claw; lark-heeled: specifically noting the coucals or cuckoos of the genus Centropus.

spuriæ (spû'ri-æ), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. (see penæ, feathers) of spurius, spurious: see spurious.] The packet of feathers growing on the bastard wing, winglet, or alula; the bastard quills, composing the alula. See ent under alula.

spurious (spû'ri-us), a. [= Sp. Pg. espurio = It. spurio, < L. spurius, of illegitimate birth, hence in gen. not genuine, false; perhaps akin to Gr. σπορά, seed, offspring, < σπερμα, sow: see spore.] 1. Not legitimate; bastard: as, spurious issue.

Her spurious first-born. Milton, S. A., l. 391.

2. Not proceeding from the true source or from the source pretended; not being what it pretends or appears to be; not genuine; counterfeit; false; adulterated.

Spurious gems our hopes entice,
While we scorn the pearl of price.
Conger, Self-diffidence (trans.).

3. In zool.: (a) False; resembling a part or organ, but not having its function: as, spurious eyes or limbs. (b) Having the functions of an organ, but morphologically different from it: as, the spurious legs, or prolegs, of a caterpillar.

(c) Aborted or changed so that the normal functions no longer exist: as, the spurious or aborted front legs of certain butterflies.

(d) Erroneous; incorrectly established: as, a spurious genus or species. See pseudogenus.—4.

In bot., false; counterfeit; apparent only.—Spurious Baltimore, the orchard-oriole, Icterus spurius, formerly supposed to be a variety of the Baltimore oriole.

Also called bastard Baltimore.—Spurious claw, in entom., same as empodium.—Spurious dissepiment, in bot., a partition in an ovary or pericarp not formed by parts of the carpels, but by an outgrowth commonly from the back of the carpel. See dissepiment.—Spurious hermaphrodites. See hermaphrodite, 1.—Spurious ocellus, a circular spot of color without any well-defined central spot or pupil.—Spurious pareira. See pareira.—Spurious primary, in ornith., the first or outermost primary or remex of a bird's wing which has at least ten primaries and the first one very short, rudimentary, or functionless. Also called spurious quill.—Spurious propositum, rainbow, stemma, etc. See the nouns.—Spurious sarsaparilla. See Hardenbergia.—Spurious vein, in entom., a faintly indicated vein or nervure of the wing, traceable only by a strong reflected light, particularly of certain hymenoptera.—Spurious wing, in ornith., the ala spuria, or bastard wing; the alula. See spuriæ, and cut under alula. [This use of spurious has no reference to the condition of a first primary so called. See above.]—Syn. 2. Spurious, Supposititious, and Counterfeit agree in expressing intent to deceive, except that counterfeit may be used with figurative lightness where no dishonorable purpose is implied. Spurious, not genuine, expresses strong disapprobation of the deception, successful or attempted. Supposititious applies only to that which is substituted for the genuine; it thus expresses a class under the spurious: a supposititious work of Athanasius is not one that is supposed to have been written by him, but one that is palmed off upon the public as being the genuine text of a work that he is known to have written; a supposititious child is a changeling; was the Tielborne claimant the genuine or a supposititious Sir Roger? Counterfeit applies also to a class under the spurious: namely, to that which is made in attempted imitation of something else: as, a counterfeit coin, bank-note, signature. Chatterton's manuscripts were spurious, but not supposititious; as they were not exact imitations of any particular manuscripts of early days, they would hardly be called counterfeit. See facticious.

spuriously (spû'ri-us-li), adv. In a spurious manner; counterfeitedly; falsely.

spuriousness (spû'ri-us-ness), n. 1. Illegitimacy; the state of being bastard, or not of legitimate birth: as, spuriousness of issue.—2. The state or quality of being spurious, counterfeit, false, or not genuine: as, the spuriousness of drugs, of coin, or of writings.

spur-leather (spér'leth'ér), n. A strap by which a spur is secured to the foot.

I could eat my very spur-leathers for anger!
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, ii. 1.

spur-legged (spér'leg'ed or -legd), a. Having spurs or spines on the legs or feet. The Leptidæ are known as spur-legged flies.

spurless (spér'les), a. [< spur + -less.] Without a spur, in any sense.

spurling (spér'ling), n. A spelling of spurling.

spurling-line (spér'ling-lin), n. Naut.: (a) A line connected with the axis of a wheel by which a tolltale or index is made to show the position of the helm. (b) A rope stretched across between the two forward shrouds, having thimbles spliced into it to serve as fair-lead-ers for the running rigging.

spur-money (spér'mun'fi), n. Money exacted for wearing spurs in church. See the quotation.

Our cathedrals (and above all St. Paul's) were, in Jonson's time, frequented by people of all descriptions, who, with a levity scarcely credible, walked up and down the aisles, and transacted business of every kind, during divine service. To expel them was not possible; such, however, was the noise occasioned by the incessant jingling of their spur-rowels, that it was found expedient to punish those who approached the body of the church, thus indecently equipped, by a small fine, under the name of spur-money, the exaction of which was committed to the beadle and singing-boys.

Gifford, Note to B. Jonson's Every Man out of his Humour, ii. 1.

spurn (spërn), v. [< ME. spurnen, sporneu, < AS. speornan (= spornan, ge-speornan, ge-spornan, "spurnan", in Somner, not authenticated), also in comp. æt-speornan, æt-spornan (pret. spearn, pl. spurnon, pp. spornen) = OS. spurnan = OHG. spurnan = Icel. sporna, spyrna, also spærna, kick against, spurn with the foot, = L. spernere, despise; ult. connected with spur.] I. trans. 1. To kick against; kick; drive back or away with the foot.

And Galashin with his foot spurned his body to ground.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 169.

Am I so round with you as you with me,
That like a football you do spurn me thus?
Shak., C. of E., ii. 1. 88.

2. To strike against.

Auglis in hondis schullen beere thee,
Lest thou spurne thi foot at a stoon.
Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 43.

3. To reject with disdain; scorn to receive or consort with; treat with contempt.

O how my soul would spurn this ball of clay,
And loathe the dainties of earth's painful pleasure!
Quarles, Emblems, v. 13.

II. intrans. 1. To kick.

I purpose not to spurn against the prick, nor labour to set up that which God pulleth down.
Bp. of Ely, in J. Gairdner's Richard III., iv.

2†. To dash the foot against something; light on something unexpectedly; stumble.

No night on it sporneth
That erst was nothing, into nought it torneth.
Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 797.

The maid . . . ran upstairs, but, spurning at the dead body, fell upon it in a swoon.
Martinus Scribnerus, l. 8.

3†. To dash; rush.—4. To manifest disdain or contempt in rejecting anything; make contemptuous opposition; manifest contempt or disdain in resistance.

It is very sure that they that be good will bear, and not spurn at the preachers.
Latimer, 3d Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1549.

Thou art regardless both of good and shame,
Spurning at virtue and a virtuous name.
Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess, v. 3.

He tosse that bee a yard above his head
That offere but a spurne.
Heywood, Royal King (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, VI. 31).

2†. A stumble; a fall. Joseph of Arimathea (E. E. T. S.), p. 19.—3. Disdainful rejection; contemptuous treatment.

The insolence of office, and the spurns
That patient merit of the unworthy takes.
Shak., Hamlet, iii. 1. 73.

4. In mining, one of the narrow pillars or connections left between the holings, and not cut away until just before the withdrawal of the sprags. [South Staffordshire coal-field, England.]

spurn<sup>2</sup> (spérn), n. [A var. of spur, after spurn<sup>1</sup>, v. Cf. G. sporn, spur, orig. an acc. form: see spur, n.] 1. A spur. [Prov. Eng.]—2. A piece of wood having one end inserted in the ground, and the other nailed at an angle to a gate-post, for the purpose of strengthening or supporting it. [Prov. Eng.]

The Faery quickly raught
His poynant speare, and sharply gan to spurne
His fomy steed.
Spenser, F. Q., III. i. 5.

spurn<sup>4</sup> (spérn), n. [Early mod. E. spoorn, spoorne; origin obscure.] An evil spirit. Hall'sell. [Prov. Eng.]

He stakes heaven at spurnpoint, and trips cross and pite whether ever he shall see the face of God or no.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 743.

spurnwater (spérn'wá'tér), n. [< spurn<sup>1</sup>, v., + obj. water.] Naut., a V-shaped barrier or breakwater, from 1 to 2 feet or more high, erected on sea-going vessels forward of the foremast, to shed water coming over the bows.

spur-pruning (spér'pró'ning), n. A mode of pruning trees by which one or two eyes of the previous year's wood are left and the rest cut off, so as to leave spurs or short rods. Compare spur-system, under spur.

spurred (spér'd), a. [< spur + -ed<sup>2</sup>] 1. Wearing spurs: as, a spurred horseman.—2. In ornith.: (a) Having unusually long claws: as, the spurred towhee, Pipilo megalonyx. S. F. Baird. [Rare.] (b) Having spurs; calcarate. See spur, n., 3 (e) (1). (c) Spur-heeled. (d) Spur-winged.

—3. In mammal, herpet., and entom., having spurs of any kind; calcarate.—4. In bot., producing or provided with a spur; calcarate.—Spurred butterfly-pea. See pea.—Spurred chameleon, Chamaeleon calcarifer.—Spurred corolla. See corolla.—Spurred gentian. See gentian.—Spurred rye. See rye and ergot, 2.—Spurred tree-frog or tree-toad, Polypedates equeus, of Ceylon, having a calcar.

spurrer (spér'ér), n. 1. One who uses spurs.—2. Somebody or something that incites or urges on.

I doubt you want a spurrer on to exercise and to amusements.
Swift, To Pope, July 16, 1723.

spurrey, n. See spurry<sup>2</sup>.

spurrer (spér'ér), n. [Early mod. E. also sporyer; < ME. sporie, sporyer, sporer; < spur + -ier<sup>1</sup>] One whose occupation is the making of spurs.

Ods so, my spurrer! put them on, boy, quickly.
B. Jonson, Staple of News, i. 1.

spur-royal (spér'roi'al), n. [Also spur-ryal, spur-rial; < spur + royal. Cf. ryal.] An English gold coin issued by James I., and worth 15s. or 16s. 6d.

(about $3.63 or $3.99). It was so named from the resemblance of the sun on its reverse to the rowel of a spur.

She has nine spur-royals, and the servants say she honrds old gold.

spurry<sup>2</sup> (spér'i), n. [Also spurrey; < OF. spurrig, < MD. sporie, spurie, spenrie, spurie, D. spurie, spurry; cf. G. spör-gel, spergel (> Sw. Dan. spergel), < ML. spurgula, spurry; origin obscure.] A plant of the genus Spergula. The common species is S. arvensis, the corn-spurry, from whose seeds a lamp-oil has sometimes been extracted. Knotted spurry, more properly called knotted pearlwort, is Sagina nodosa. The lawn-spurry (or properly lawn-pearlwort) is Sagina glabra. The sand-spurry is of the genus Spergularia. See Spergularia.

Spurry [F.], spurry, or frank; a Dutch herb and an excellent fodder for cattle. Colgrave.

spur-shell (spér-shel), n. A shell of the genus Imperator (formerly called Calcar): so named from its resemblance to the rowel of a spur. The term extends to some similar trochiform shells. See out under Imperator.

spur-shore (spér'shór), n. Naut., same as spur, 3 (m) (1).

spurt<sup>1</sup>, spirt<sup>1</sup> (spért), v. [Both spellings are in use, spirt being etymologically more correct, and spurt appar. the more common spelling; a transposed form of spirt<sup>1</sup> (like bird<sup>1</sup>, bird<sup>2</sup>, transposed forms of brid, bridel): see spirt<sup>1</sup>. The word is prob. confused with spurt<sup>2</sup>, spirt<sup>2</sup>.] 1. intrans. 1†. To sprout; shoot.

Shall a few sprays of us . . .
Our selons put in wild and savage stock,
Spirt up so suddenly into the clouds,
And overlook their gratters?
Shak., Hen. V., iii. 5. 8.

Did you ever see a fellow so spurted up in a moment? He has got the right ear of the duke, the prince, princess, most of the lords, but all the ladies.
Marston, The Fawne, ii. 1.

2. To gush or issue out suddenly in a stream, as liquor from a cask; rush with sudden force from a confined place in a small jet or stream.

Thus the small jet, which hasty hands unlock,
Spirts in the gardener's eyes who turns the cock.
Pope, Dunciad, li. 178.

The Prince's blood spirted upon the scarf.
Tennyson, Geraint.

II. trans. To throw or force out in a jet or stream; squirt: as, to spurt water from the mouth; to spurt liquid from a tube.

With toonge three forked furth spirts tyra.
Stanhurst, Æneid (ed. Arber, p. 59), ii.

Toads are sometimes observed to exclud or spirt out a dark and liquid matter behind.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 13.

spurt<sup>1</sup>, spirt<sup>1</sup> (spért), n. [< spurt<sup>1</sup>, spirt<sup>1</sup>, v. Cf. sproul, sproul, n.] 1†. A shoot; a sprout; a bud.

These nuts . . . have in the mids a little chit or spirt.
Holland, tr. of Pliny, xv. 22.

2. A forcible gush of liquid from a confined place; a jet.

Water, dash'd from flashy stalls, shall stain
His hapless coat with spirts of scaly rain.
Gay, Trivia, iii. 106.

3. A brief and sudden outbreak.

A sudden spurt of woman's jealousy.
Tennyson, Merlin and Vivien.

4. A school of shad. [Connecticut.]

spurt<sup>2</sup>, spirt<sup>2</sup> (spért), v. i. [Both spellings are in use, spirt being etymologically the more correct, and spurt the more common spelling; also rarely spert; a transposed form of **spirt* or **spret* (cf. E. dial. sprut, jerk), < Ice. spretta

(for **sprenta*) (pret. spratt, for **sprant*), start, spring, also sprout, spout, = Sw. spritta, start, startle, = MHG. sprengen, spout, crack; the orig. nasal appearing in sprent, ME. sprenten, bound, leap, and the noun sprint, dial. sprunt, a convulsive struggle, etc.: see sprint, sprint.] To make a short, sudden, and exceptional effort; put forth one's utmost energy for a short time, especially in racing.

Cambridge spurted desperately in turn, . . . and so they went, fighting every inch of water. O. Reade, Hard Cash, l.

spurt<sup>2</sup>, spirt<sup>2</sup> (spért), n. [Cf. Ice. sprettr, a spurt, spring, bound, run; from the verb. Cf. sprunt<sup>1</sup>, spirt<sup>1</sup>.] 1. A short, sudden, extraordinary effort for an emergency; a special exertion of one's self for a short distance or space of time, as in running, rowing, etc.: as, by a fine spurt he obtained the lead.

The long, steady sweep of the so-called paddle tried him almost as much as the breathless strain of the spurt.
T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Oxford, i. vi.

In the race of fame, there are a score capable of brilliant spurts for one who comes in winner after a steady pull with wind and muscle to spare.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 281.

2†. A short period; a brief interval of time.

Heere for a spirt linger, no good opportunity escaping.
Stanhurst, Æneid, iii. 453.

He lov'd you but for a spurt or so.
Marston and Webster, Malcontent, i. 6.

spurtle<sup>1</sup>, spirtle<sup>1</sup> (spér'tl), v. t. and i. [Freq. of spurt<sup>1</sup>, spirt<sup>1</sup>; in origin a transposed form of sprittle, spruttle: see spurt<sup>1</sup>, spirt<sup>1</sup>, spirt<sup>1</sup>, spruttle, etc.] To shoot in a scattering manner; spurt. [Rare.]

The brains and mingled blood were spirtled on the wall.

spurtle<sup>2</sup>, spirtle<sup>2</sup> (spér'tl), n. [Dim. of spirt<sup>1</sup>. Cf. spurtle<sup>1</sup>, spirtle<sup>1</sup>.] A stick used for stirring. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

Geo. MacDonald, Warlock o' Glenwarlock, xlix.

spurtle-blade (spér'tl-blád), n. A broadsword. [Scotch.]

It's tauld he was a sodger bred, . . .
But now he's quat the spurtle blade.
Burns, Captain Grose's Peregrinations.

spur-track (spér'trak), n. A short track leading from a line of railway, and connected with it at one end only.

spur-tree (spér'tré), n. A West Indian shrub or small tree, Petitia Domingensis. Also called yellow fiddlewood.

spurway (spér'wá), n. A horse-path; a narrow way; a bridle-road; a way for a single beast. [Prov. Eng.] spur-whang (spér'hwang), n. A spur-leather. Scott, Monastery. [Scotch.] spur-wheel (spér'hwél), n. The common form of cog-wheel, in which the cogs are radial and peripheral, and made to engage corresponding cogs on another wheel. Compare cut under pinion. E. H. Knight.

spurwing (spér'wing), n. A spur-winged bird. Especially—(a) A jacana, or any bird of the family Jacaniidae or Partridge, of which the spur on the wing is a characteristic. See cut under jacana. (b) A spur-winged goose. See cut under Plectropterus. (c) A spur-winged plover. See Chettusia and spur-winged.

spur-winged (spér'wingd), a. Having a horny spur on the pinion, as various birds. It is a weapon of offense and defense. It is sometimes double, as is well shown in the cut under Palamedea. See also cuts under jacana and Plectropterus.—Spur-winged goose, a species of Plectropterus, as P. gambensis.—Spur-winged plovers, those plovers or lapwings, of the family Charadriidae, and of several different genera, in which a spur is developed on the wing (including some species of these genera in which such a spur falls to develop). Wing-spurs are more frequent in this than in any other family of birds (excepting the related Jacaniidae or Partridge). None occur, however, in the true plovers (of the genera Chara- drius, Aegialites, Eudromias, Squatrola, etc.); they are commonest among those plovers which are related to the lapwing of Europe (Vanellus cristatus, which, however, has none), and which have a hind toe and often wattles on the face. The presence of spurs and wattles is often coincident. South American spur-winged plovers, with hind toe and no wattles, constitute the genus Belonopterus; they are two, the Cayenne and the Chilian lapwings, B. cayennensis and B. chilensis; both are erected. The type of the genus Hoplopterus is the Egyptian spur-winged plover, H. spinosus, with large spurs, a crest, no hind toe, and no wattles; it has when adult the whole crown, chin, throat, breast, flanks, and legs black, and the greater wing-coverts and some other parts white. It inhabits especially northern Africa, abounds in Egypt and Nubia, and extends into parts of Europe and Asia. It is among the birds supposed to have been a basis of the trochilus of the ancients (compare crocodile-bird, sicac, and cut under Phasianus). It is represented in South Africa by the black-backed spurred lapwing, H. speciosus, with large spurs and the top of the head white. The Indian spur-winged lapwing, H. ventralis, has a black cap, a black patch on the belly in white surroundings, and large spurs. Two South American forms, with spurs, but no wattles, crest, or hind toe, are the Peruvian bronze-winged lapwing, H. resplendens, and the little white-winged, H. cayanus (or stolatus), if the term cayanus be thought too near cayennensis; each of these has been made the basis of a different generic name. In the type of the genus Chelusia, C. gregaria (see cut under Chelusia), and several related species, a hind toe is present, and neither spurs nor wattles are developed; but the name has been used to cover various species with wattles and spurs, more properly separated under the term Lobiranellus. In this group it is the rule that large wattles are associated with well-developed spurs, for in those species which have very small wattles the spurs are almost or quite obsolete. Variations in these respects, and in the presence or absence of the hind toe, have caused the erection of other genera. (See Sarcophorus, Typhidopterus, etc.) Five of the best-marked species of Lobiranellus proper, with large spurs, large wattles, and a hind toe, are the following: L. senegalus, of the Ethiopian region north of the equator; L. lateralis, of South Africa; L. cucullatus, of Java, Sumatra, etc.; L. personatus, of northern Australia, New Guinea, and some other islands; and L. lobatus, of eastern Australia from Rockingham Bay to Tasmania (see cut under wattled).

Spur-wheel.

Egyptian Spur-winged Plover (Hopllopterus spinosus).

spurwort (spér'wört), n. [spur + wort]. The field-madder, Sherardia arvensis: so called from its whorls of leaves, likened to the rowel of a spur.

sput (sput), n. [Origin obscure.] A thimble or annular plate used to reinforce a hole in a boiler. E. H. Knight.

sputa, n. Plural of sputum.

1. A person who keeps a constant watch on the actions, motions, conduct, etc., of others; one who secretly watches what is going on.

This sour Informer, this hate-breeding spy.

Shak., Veaus and Adonis, I. 655.

He told me that he had so good spies that he hath had the keys taken out of De Witt's pocket when he was a-bed, and his closet opened, and papers brought to him, and left in his hands for an hour, and carried back and laid in the place again, and keys put into De Witt's pocket again.

2. A secret emissary who goes into an enemy's camp or territory to inspect his works, ascertain his strength and his intentions, watch his movements, and report thereon to the proper officer. By the laws of war among all civilized nations a spy is liable to capital punishment.

On the morrow early Gaveln sent a spy to see what the saines diden that thei hadde left at the bridge of dione.

Merlin (E. E. T. S.), II. 200.

Edmund Palmer, an officer in the enemy's service, was taken as a spy lurking within our lines; he has been tried as a spy, condemned as a spy, and shall be executed as a spy.

Gen. Israel Putnam, To Sir Henry Clinton, Aug. 7, 1777.

3. The pilot of a vessel.—4. An advanced guard; a forerunner. [Rare.]

Since knowledge is but sorrow's spy,

It is not safe to know.

Sir W. Davenant, The Just Italian, v. 1 (song).

[In the following passage, spy is supposed by some to mean that which precedes and announces the time for the assassination of Banquo, by others the very eye, the exact moment.

I will advise you where to plant yourselves;
Acquaint you with the perfect spy of the time,
The moment on 't; for 't must be done to-night.

Shak., Macbeth, III. 1. 130.]

5. A glance; look; peep. [Rare.]

squabble (skwob'l'), v.; pret. and pp. squabbled, ppr. squabbling. [*< Sw. dial. *skvabla*, dispute (skvabbel, a dispute), freq. of skvappa, chide, lit. make a splashing, < skvapp, a splash: see svab, svap.] I. intrans. To engage in a noisy quarrel or row; wrangle; quarrel and fight noisily; brawl; scuffle.

Drunk? and speak parrot? and squabble? swagger? swear? Shak., Othello, li. 3. 279.

We should squabble like Brother and Sister.

II. trans. In printing, to disarrange and mix (lines of composod types) when they are standing on their feet.

The letters do not range well, giving an irregular or squabbled appearance to the line. Science, VIII. 254.

squabble (skwob'l'), n. [< Sw. dial. skvubbel, a dispute; from the verb.] A wrangle; a dispute; a brawl; a scuffle; a noisy quarrel.

Pragmatic fools commonly begin the squabble, and crafty knaves reap the benefit. Sir R. L'Estrange.

This contrariety of humours betwixt my father and my uncle was the source of many a fraternal squabble.

A French woman is a perfect architect in dress; . . . she never tricks out a squabby Doric shape with Corinthian finery.

squab-chick (skwob'ebik), n. A chick, or young chicken, not fully feathered; a fledgling. [Prov. Eng.]

squab-pie (skwob'pi), n. 1. A pie made of squabs; pigeon-pie.—2. A pie made of fat mutton well peppered and salted, with layers of apple and an onion or two. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

Cornwall squab-pye, and Devon white-pot brings; And Leicester beans and bacon, food of kings! W. King, Art of Cookery, l. 165.

squacco (skwak'ó), n. [A native name, prob. imitative (cf. quack<sup>1</sup>, quail<sup>3</sup>).] A small rail-like heron of Europe, Asia, and Africa, Ardea or Ardeola comata, rallioides, castanea, or squatiola, of a white color, much varied with chestnut or russet-brown and black. The head is crested, with six long black and white plumes; the bill is cobalt-blue, Squacco (Ardeola comata).

tinged with black; the lores are emerald-green; the feet flesh-colored, with yellow soles and black claws; and the irides pale-yellow. The squacco nests in heronries, usually on a tree, and lays four to six greenish-blue eggs. It is rare in Europe north of the Mediterranean basin, but common in most parts of Africa, and extends into a small part of Asia.

Squad your men, and form up on the road.

Lever, Charles O'Malley, lxxvi. (Encyc. Diet.)

squad<sup>2</sup> (skwod), n. [Origin obscure; perhaps a dial. var. of shode, ult. < AS. scēddan, scēdan, separate: see shode<sup>1</sup>.] 1. Soft, slimy mud. [Prov. Eng.]-2. In mining, loose ore of tin mixed with earth. [Cornish.]

squaddy (skwod'i), a. [A var. of squatly.] Squabby. [Old Eng. and U. S.]

A fatte squaddy mouke that had beene well fedde in some cloyster.

Greene, News both from Heaven and Hell (1503). (Nares.)

I had hardly got seated when in came a great, stout, fat, squaddy woman.

Major Downing, May-Day. (Bartlett.)

squadron (skwod'ron), n. [= D. escadron = Dan. eskadron, < OF. esquadron, F. escadron = Sp. escuadron = Pg. esquadra (= G. schwadrone = Sw. svadron), < It. squadron, a squadron, aug. of squadra, a squad, a square: see squad<sup>1</sup>, square<sup>1</sup>.] 1. A square.

Six days journey from Bezeneger is the place where they get Diamonds; . . . it is a great place, compassed with a wall, and . . . they sell the earth within the wall for so much a squadron, and the limits are set how deepe or how low they shall digge. Hakluyt's Voyages, li. 221.

2. A body of soldiers drawn up in a square, or in regular array, as for battle; specifically, in modern armies, the principal division of a regiment of cavalry. This corresponds more or less closely to a company in the infantry, and consists of two troops, each commanded by a captain. The actual strength of a squadron varies from 120 to 200 men.

The Ordovices, to welcome the new General, had hewn in peeces a whole Squadron of Horse.

Milton, Hist. Eng., ii.

3. A division of a fleet; a detachment of ships of war employed on a particular service or station, and under the command of a flag-officer.

—4. Generally, any ranked and orderly body or group.—5. In early New England records (1636), one of four divisions of town land, probably in the first instance a square. The records show that squadron was used later in other senses: (a) A division of a town for highway care.

Agreed upon by the selectmen for the . . . calling out of their men to work, that is within their several squadrons.

Town Records, Groton, Mass., 1671.

(b) A school district.

Voted and chose a committee of seven men to apportion the school in six societies or squadrons, . . . taking the northwesterly corner for one squadron.

Town Records, Marlborough, Mass., 1749.

Sometimes spelled squadrant.

squadron (skwod'ron), v. t. [< squadron, n.]

1. To form into squadrons, as a body of soldiers. Hence—2. To form in order; array.

They gladly hidder haste, and by a quire

Of squadron'd angels hear his carols sung.

squail, squale (skwāl), n. [Also scale; perhaps a dial. var. of skail, in pl. skails, formerly skayles, a var. of kail: see kail<sup>2</sup> and skayles.] 1. A disk or counter used in the game of squails.

Urge, towards the table's centre,

With unerring hand, the squail.

C. S. Calverley, There Stands a City.

2. pl. A game in which disks or counters are driven by snapping them from the edge of a round board or table at a mark in the center.

—3. pl. Ninepins. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

squail, squale (skwāl), v. [< squail, n.] I. intrans. To throw a stick, loaded stick, disk, flat stone, or other object at a mark: often applied to the throwing of sticks at cocks or geese on Shrove Tuesday, a sport formerly popular in England. Grose. [Prov. Eng. and New Eng.]

II. trans. To aim at, throw at, or pelt with sticks or other missiles.

"Squailing a goose before his door, and tossing dogs and cats on Shrove Tuesday" (Mr. Hunt's "Bristol"). The allusion is to the republican mayor of the city in 1651.

N. and Q., 7th ser., IV. 169.

squail-board (skwāl'bôrd), n. The round board upon which the game of squails is played.

squailer (skwāl'ér), n. A kind of throwing-stick, an improvement on that used formerly in squailing cocks or geese.

Armed with squailers, on ingenious instrument composed of a short stick of plant cane and a leaded knob, to drive the harmless little squirrel from tree to tree, and lay it a victim at the feet of a successful shot.

Daily Telegraph, Nov. 30, 1881. (Encyc. Diet.)

squaimoust, a. See squamous.

squaint, n. An obsolete dialectal form of swain.

squalder (skwol'dér), n. A kind of jelly-fish. See the quotation.

I have oftentimes mett with two other entities which seeme to bee of a congenerous substance with the afore-named gellies, both of them to bee found in the saltwater. One is flat and round, as broad as a mans palm, or broader, and as thick as the hand, cleare and transparent, convex on one side and somewhat like the gibbous part of the human liver, on the other side concave with a contrivance like a knott in the very middle thereof, but plainly with circular fibers about the verge or edge of it (where it is growne thin) which enffer manifest constriction and dilatation, which doe promote its natotion, which is also perceptible, and by which you may discern it to advance towards the shore, or recede from it. About us they are generally called squalders, but are indeed evidently fishes, although not described in any Ichthyology I have yet mett with. Dr. R. Robinson, To Sir T. Browne, Dec. 12, 1659 (in Sir T. Browne's Works, l. 423).

squale, n. and v. See squail.

Squali (skwāl'i), n. pl. [NL. (Müller, 1835), pl. of L. squalus, a shark: see Squalus.] In ichth., a section of elasmobranchiate fishes, or selachians, having the gill-slits lateral and plural, five, six, or seven in number; the sharks proper, as distinguished from the Raiæ (rays or skates, with ventral gill-slits) and from the Holocephali (chimeras, with gill-slits a single pair). The name has been used for groups of various extent; it is now generally restricted to the plagiostomous fishes with lateral branchial apertures and the pectoral fins regularly curved backward from the base of insertion. The Squali are divided into about 12 families and many genera, the nomenclature of which is by no means fixed. See Selachii and shark, and cuts under Selachian and Dogfish.

squalid (skwol'id), a. [< L. squalidus, foul, filthy, < squalere, be stiff, rough, or dry (with anything), esp. be stiff or rough from negligence or want of care, be foul; cf. Gr. σκέλεω, be dry (see skelet, skeleton).] 1. Foul; filthy; extremely dirty: as, a squalid haggard; a squalid house.

Uncomb'd his locks, and squalid his attire.
Dryden, Pal. and Arc., l. 539.

2t. Rough; shaggy. [Rare.]

Squalidæ (skwā'lī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Squalus + -idæ.] A family of sharks, typified by the genus Squalus, to which various limits have been assigned. By Bonaparte the name was used for all true sharks. By some other writers it has been used instead of Acanthiidae. See dogfish and picked.

squalidly (skwō'lī-dī), adv. In a squalid or filthy manner. Imp. Dict. squalidness (skwō'lī-dī-nos), n. Squalidity. Imp. Dict.

squaliform (skwā'lī-fōrm), a. [LL. squalus, a shark, + forma, form.] Of, or having the characters of, the Squali; resembling a shark.

Squalius (skwā'lī-us), n. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1837), < L. squalus, a shark. The European dace was at one time called, for no obvious reason, Squalus minor.] A genus of small cyprinoid fishes, many of which are known as dace. The type is the European dace, Cyprinus leuciscus of the Linnean system, now called Squalius leuciscus or Leuciscus vulgaris. Numerous American species fall in this genus, and are loosely known as minnows, shiners, chubs, mullets, etc. See cut under dace.

squall (skwāl), n. [Sw. squal, a rush of water (squal-regn), a violent shower of rain, a squall (= Norw. skval, a gushing, rippling, rinsing-water; cf. Dan. skyl, also skyl-regn, a violent shower of rain), < squala, dial. skvala, skvāla, gush out, = Norw. skvala, gush out, splash, ripple; also in secondary forms, Norw. skrelja, gush, splash; Norw. skola, wash, gush, = Icel. skola, wash; Icel. skyla = Norw. skylla = Dan. skylle, wash. The word is generally assumed to be connected with squall.] A sudden and violent gust of wind, or a succession of such gusts, usually accompanied by rain, snow, or sleet. In a ship's log-book abbreviated g.

A lowering squall obscures the southern sky.
Falconer, Shipwreck, ll. 146.

No gladder does the stranded wreck
See thro' the gray skirts of a lifting squall
The boat that bears the hope of life approach.
Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

Arched squall, a remarkable squall occurring near the equator, in which a mass of black clouds collects and rapidly rises, forming a vast arch, or ring-shaped bed of cloud. The ring of cloud enlarges, and above it masses of cloud rise higher and higher until they reach the zenith. Then usually, though not invariably, a violent thunder-storm breaks forth, with vivid zigzag lightning, deafening peals of thunder, and torrents of rain, lasting, perhaps, for half an hour. The phenomenon varies in its details in different seas, but occurs most frequently and on the grandest scale in the southern part of the China Sea, the Gulf of Siam, the Sulu Sea, and particularly in the Straits of Malacca.—Black squall, a squall attended with a specially dark cloud.—Bull's-eye squall, a white squall of great violence on the west coast of Africa.—Heavy squall, a squall in which the wind blows with much force.—Line-squall, a squall accompanying the passage of the trough of a V-shaped barometric depression: so named because the squalls form a line coincident with the axis of the trough, which sweeps across the country, broadside on, with the progressive motion of the depression.—Thick squall, a squall in which the rain or snow obscures the view.—To look out for squalls, to be on one's guard; to be on the watch against trouble or danger. [Colloq.]—White squall, a whirlwind of small radius arising suddenly in fair weather without the usual formation of clouds. The only indication of its development is the boiling of the sea beneath the current of ascending air around which the rapid gyrations take place, together with a patch of white cloud, generally formed above it at the level of condensation. These are also the conditions of a waterspout, which may or may not be completely formed, according to the energy of the whirl and the amount of vapor in the atmosphere. White squalls are infrequent, and rarely occur outside of the tropics; in general they are dangerous only to sailing vessels and small craft.—Syn. Gale, etc. See wind.

squall (skwāl), v. i. [LL. squall, n.] To blow a squall: used chiefly impersonally: as, it squalled terribly. [Colloq.]

And the quarter-deck tarpauling
Was shivered in the squalling.
Thackeray, The White Squall.

squall (skwāl), v. [Early mod. E. also squaw; < Icel. skvala, scream, = Sw. dial. skvala, skvāla, cry out, chatter, = Dan. (freq.) skvaltre, clamor; cf. Icel. skella (pret. skall), resound, = G. schallen, resound (see scoll); cf. Sc. squallach, skel-loch, cry shrilly, Gael. sgal, howl. Cf. squall, and see squall.] 1. Intrans. To cry out; scream or cry violently, as a frightened woman or a child in anger or distress: used in contempt or dislike.

You can laugh, and squall, and romp in full security.
Swift, Advice to Servants (General Directions).

"Send that squalling little brat about his business, and do what I bid ye, sir," says the Doctor.
Thackeray, Henry Esmond, iii. 5.

II. trans. To utter in a discordant, screaming tone.

And pray, what are your Town Diversions? To hear a parcel of Italian Eunuchs, like so many Cats, squall out somewhat you don't understand.
Pembroke, Wells, in Ashton's Queen Anne, l. 323.

squall (skwāl), n. [LL. squall, v.] A harsh cry; a loud and discordant scream; a sound intermediate in character between a squawk and a squawl.

There oft we heard the notes of infant woe.
The short thick sob, loud scream, and shriller squall.
Pope, Imit. of Spenser, The Alley.

squall (skwāl), n. [Perhaps a particular use of squall.] A baby; pet; mix; girl: used vaguely, in endearment or reproach.

A pretty, beautiful, juicy squall.
Middleton, Michaelmas Term, l. 2.

The rich full gallant call's her dear and love.
Ducke, Imbue, squall, sweet-heart, cony, and his dove.
Taylor's Workes (1630).

squaller (skwāl'ēr), n. [LL. squall + -er.] One who squalls; one who shrieks or cries aloud.

squally (skwāl'i), a. [LL. squall + -y.] 1. Abounding with squalls; disturbed often with sudden and violent gusts of wind: as, squally weather.—2. Threatening; ominous: as, things began to look squally. [Colloq.]

squally (skwāl'i), a. [Perhaps a dial. var. of squally.] 1. Having unproductive spots interspersed throughout: said of a field of turnips or corn. [Prov. Eng.].—2. Badly woven; showing knots in the thread or irregularities in the weaving: said of a textile fabric.

squaloid (skwāl'oid), a. [LL. Squalus + Gr. eidōs, form.] Like a shark of the genus Squalus; selachian or plagiostomous, as a true shark; of or pertaining to the Squalidae; squaliform.

squalor (skwōl'gr or skwāl'ōr), n. [L. squalor, roughness, filth; < squalere, to stiffen or rough, as with dirt; see squalid.] Foulness; filthiness; coarseness.

Nastiness, squalor, ugliness, hunger.
Burton.

Squalor (skwāl'ōr), n. [Scot. law, the strictness of imprisonment which a creditor is entitled to enforce, in order to compel the debtor to pay the debt, or disclose funds he may have concealed.]

Squalus (skwāl'us), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1748), < L. squalus, a kind of sea-fish.] A genus founded by Linnaeus, including all the sharks and shark-like selachians known to him (15 species in 1766). See Acanthias, and cut under dogfish.

squam (skwom), n. [LL. Annisquam, a fishing-hamlet in Massachusetts.] An oilskin hat worn originally by fishermen and deep-water sailors; a cheap yellow sou'wester. [U. S.]

squama (skwā'mī), n. [NL. squama (skwā'mī), n.; pl. squamæ (skwā'mī), [NL., < L. squama, a scale; see squame.] 1. In bot., a scale of any sort, usually the homologue of a leaf.—2. In anat. and zool.: (a) A scale, as of the epidermis. (b) A thin, expansive, scale-like part of a bone: as, the squama of the temporal bone (the squamosal); the squama of the occipital bone (the supra-occipital).—3. In ornith., a scale-like feather, as one of those upon a penguin's wing or the throat of a humming-bird. See cut under Squamipinnes.—4. In entom., an olytrum.—Squama frontalis, the vertical part of the frontal bone.—Squama occipitis, the thin expanded part of the occipital bone; the supra-occipital.—Squama temporalis, the thin shell-like part, or the squamous portion, of the temporal bone.

squamaceous (skwā-mī'shi-us), a. [LL. squama, a scale, + -aceus.] Same as squamous or squamos.

Squamata (skwā-mī'tī), n. pl. [NL., nont. pl. of L. squama, scale; see squamate.] 1. In herpet., the scaly reptiles. (a) An order of Reptilia, established by Oepel in 1811. It was composed of the saurians or lizards (including crocodiles) and snakes or ophidians, divided accordingly into Sauria and Ophidia. Its contents were the modern orders Crocodylia, Lacertilia, and Ophidia, with, however, one foreign element (Amphisbæna). (b) In Merriem's system of classification (1820), same as Oepel's Squamata exclusive of the crocodiles, or Loricata of Merriem. It formed the third order of Pholidota or scaly reptiles, divided into Gradientia, Reptentia, Serpentia, Incedentia, and Preidentia. Also called Lepidosauria, and formerly Sauropsidia.

2. In mammal., scaly mammals; a group of the Entomophaga or insectivorous edentates, containing the single family Mandidae, the scaly ant-eaters, or pangolins, in which the body is squamated, being covered with horny overlapping scales. The group is now usually ranked as a suborder.

squamate (skwā'māt), a. [LL. squamatus, scaly, < L. squama, a scale; see squame.] 1. In zool., scaly; covered with scales or squamæ; squamoso or squamigerous; specifically, of or pertaining to the Squamata, in any sense.—2. In anat., scale-like; forming or formed like a scale; squamous or squamiform: as, a squamate bone; squamate scales of cuticle.—3. In bot., same as squamos.

squamated (skwā'mā-ted), a. [LL. squamate + -ed.] Same as squamate.

squamation (skwā-mā'shon), n. [LL. squamate + -ion.] In zool., the state or character of being squamate, squamoso, or scaly; the collection or formation of scales or squamæ of an animal: as, the squamation of a lizard, snake, or pangolin. Compare desquamation.

squam-duck (skwōm'duk), n. See duck 2.

squame (skwām), n. [ME. squame, < L. squama, a scale (of a fish, serpent, etc.), a scale (of metal), scale-armor, a cataract in the eye, hull of millot, etc., LL. fig. roughness; prob. akin to squalere, be stiff or rough: see squalid.] 1t. A thin layer; a scale.

Orpiment, burnt bones, yren squames.
Chaucer, Prolog. to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 208.

2. In zool., a scale or squama. Huxley, Crayfish, p. 172.

squamella (skwā-mel'ē), n.; pl. squamellæ (-ē). [NL., dim. of L. squama, a scale; see squame.]

1. In bot., same as squamula, 2.—2. [cap.] In zool., a genus of zygotrochous rotifers, of the family Euchlanidae.

squamellate (skwā-mel'ēt), a. [NL. squamellatus, < squamella, q. v.] Same as squamulate.

squamelliferous (skwā-mel'ē-rus), a. [NL. squamella, a little scale, + L. ferre = E. bear.] In bot., furnished with or bearing squamellæ.

Squamifera (skwā-mif'ē-rā), n. pl. [NL., < F. Squamifères (De Blainville, 1816), < L. squama, a scale, + ferre = E. bear.] Squamous or scaly reptiles; Reptilia proper, as distinguished from Nudipellifera or Amphibia; also called Ornithoides.

squamiferous (skwā-mif'ē-rus), a. [LL. squama, a scale, + ferre = E. bear.] 1. Provided with squamæ or scales; squamate; squamigerous.—2. In bot., hearing scales: as, a squamiferous catkin.

squamiflorous (skwā-mi-flō-rus), a. [LL. squama, a scale, + flos (flor-), flower.] In bot., having flowers like scales; also, having scales hearing flowers, as in the Conifera.

squamiform (skwā-mi-fōrm), a. [LL. squama, a scale, + forma, form.] Having the shape, character, or appearance of a scale; squamate in form or structure; scale-like.

squamigerous (skwā-mij'ē-rus), a. [LL. squama, a scale, bearing, < squama, a scale, + gerere, bear, carry.] Provided with squamæ; squamoso; squamiferous.

squamipen (skwā-mi-pen), n. Any fish of the group Squamipinnes or Squamipinnes.

squamipennate (skwā-mi-pen'āt), a. [LL. squama, a scale, + penna, a wing; see pennate.] Having scaly feathers, as a penguin.

Squamipinnes (skwā-mi-pin'ēz), n. pl. [NL., < L. squama, a scale, + penna, a wing, flu: see penn.] 1. In ichth., same as Squamipinnes.

2. In ornith., the penguins, or Spheniscet: so called from the scale-like character of the plumage.

[Rare.]

Squamipinnes (skwā-mi-pin'ēz), n. pl. [NL. (Cuvier, spelled Squamipinnes): see Squamipinnes.] In ichth.: (a) In Cuvier's system of classification, the sixth family of acanthopterygian fishes: so called because the soft and frequently the spinous parts of their dorsal and anal fins are covered with scales, which render it difficult to distinguish them from the body. The body is generally much compressed; the intestines are long, and the caeca numerous. The group included the families Chetodontidae, Ephippidae, Zanclidae, Scatoph-

Squamipinnes.—Scaly feather from anterior edge of wing of penguin (Aptenodytes longirostris), enlarged 8 times.

squamoid (skwā'moid), a. [< L. squama, a scale, + Gr. εἶδος, form.] 1. Resembling a squama; squamiform; scale-like.—2. Squamous; sealy; squamate.

I have not kept my square; but that to come Shall all be done by the rule.

Shak., A. and C., ii. 3. 6.

9. A body of troops drawn up in quadrilateral form. The formation used in the sixteenth century and afterward was a nearly solid body of pikemen, to which the harquebussiers, crossbowmen, etc., formed an accessory, as by being posted on the flanks, etc. In Shakespeare's time troops drawn up in battle array were primarily in squares. At the present time the square is a hollow formation, composed of four fronts, each from two to five ranks deep, having the officers, colors, etc., in the center. This formation is used to repel cavalry, or to resist any superior force which outflanks or surrounds the body of troops. See hollow square, below.

He alone Dealt on Montanant, and no practice had
In the brave squares of war.

Shak., A. and C., iii. 11. 40.

Dash'd on every rocky square,
Their surging charges foam'd themselves away.

Tennyson, Death of Wellington.

10. A name given to various squared projections or shanks to which other parts of machines may be fitted.—11†, Lovel; equality; generally with the. See on the square (b), below.—12. In astron., quartile; the position of planets distant 90 degrees from each other. See aspect, 7.

Their planetary motions, and aspects,
In sextile, square, and trine.

Milton, P. L., x. 650.

13†. Opposition; enmity; quarrel. See square<sup>1</sup>, r. i., 2.—14. A part of a woman's dress. (a) The yoke of a chemise or gown: so called because often cut square or angular. [Still in provincial use.]

The sleeve-hand, and the work about the square on't (a smock).

Shak., W. T., iv. 4. 212.

(b) A square opening in the upper part of the front of a bodice, or other garment covering the throat and neck. It is usually filled in with another material, except for evening dress.

A round Sable Tippet, about 2 yards long, the Sable pretty deep and dark, with a piece of black silk in the square of the neck.

Advt. quoted in Ashton's Reign of Queen Anne, i. 173.

15. A puzzle or device consisting of a series of words so selected that when arranged in a square they may

16. In bookbinding, the parts of the cover of a bound book that project beyond the edge of the leaves.—17. The square end of the arbor designed to receive the winding-key of a watch, or the similar part by which the hands of the watch are set.—18. In flooring, roofing, and other branches of mechanical art, an area 10 feet square; 100 square feet.—19.

In her., a bearing representing a carpenter's square. (See def. 5.) It is represented with or without the scale.—20. In organ-building, a thin piece of wood, in or nearly in the shape of a right-angled triangle, pivoted at the right or largest angle and connected with trackers at the other angles. It serves to change the direction of the tracker-action from vertical to horizontal, or vice versa.—A deep square, a long projection.—A small square, a narrow projection.—At square, in opposition; at enmity.

Marry, she knew you and I were at square;
At least we fell to blows.

Promos and Cassandra, ii. 4. (Nares.)

She falling at square with his husband.

Holinshed, Hist. Eng., iv. 8.

By the square, exactly; accurately.

Not the worst of the three but jumps twelve foot and a half by the square.

Shak., W. T., iv. 4. 348.

Why, you can tell us by the square, neighbour,
Whence he is call'd a constable.

J. Jonson, Tale of a Tub, iv. 2.

Cyclical square. See cyclical.—Face of a square. See face.—Geometrical square. Same as quadrant, 2.—Gunners' square. Same as quadrant, 6.—Hollow square, a body of infantry drawn up in square with a space in the middle to receive baggage, colors, drums, etc. When orders or proclamations are to be read to troops, it is usual to form a hollow square, with the files facing inward. See def. 9.—Incuse square. See incuse.—In square, square.

Then did a sharped spire of Diamond bright,
Ten feet each way in square, appear to mee.

Spenser, Visions of Belknap, i. 36.

Magic square. See magic.—Method of least squares, the method used by astronomers, geodesists, and others of deducing the most probable or best result of their observations, in cases in which the arithmetical mean of a number of observations of the same quantity is the most probable or best value of that quantity. The adoption of the mean value of a number of observations may be considered as the simplest application of the method of least squares. When the observed values depend upon several unknown quantities, the rule which results from the principle of the arithmetical mean is to adopt such values for the unknown quantities as to make the sum of the squares of the residual errors of the observations the least possible. When there are certain conditions that must be fulfilled, as for example, in geodesy, that the sum of the angles of each triangle must equal two right angles plus the spherical excess, the rules become still more complicated. There are also rules for calculating probable errors, etc.—Nasik squares. See the quotation.

Squares that have many more summations than in rows, columns, and diagonals have been investigated by the Rev. A. H. Frost (Cambridge Math. Jour., 1857), and called Nasik squares from the town in India where he resided; and he has extended the method to cubes (called Nasik cubes), various sections of which have the same singular properties. Encyc. Brit., XV. 215.

Naval square, a rectangular figure painted on a ship's deck in some convenient place, for the purpose of aiding in taking the bearings of other ships of a squadron or of objects on shore.—Normal square, the mathematical instrument called a square, for determining right angles.—On or upon the square. (a) At right angles; straight: as, to cut cloth on the square, as opposed to bias. Hence, figuratively.—(b) On an equality; on equal terms.

They [the Presbyterians] chose rather to be lorded over once more by a tyrant . . . than endure their brethren and friends to be upon the square with them.

Milton, Ans. to Salmasius, x.

We live not on the square with such as these;
Such are our betters who can better please.

Dryden, tr. of Juvenal's Satires, iii. 170.

(c) Honest; just; fairly; honestly.

Keep upon the square, for God sees you; therefore do your duty.

Penn., To his Wife and Children.

"Was the marriage all right, then?" "Oh, all on the square—civil marriage, elureh—everything."

George Eliot, Felix Holt, xxi.

Optical square, an instrument used in surveying for laying out lines at right angles to each other. It consists of a circular brass box containing two principal glasses of the sextant, viz. the index- and horizon-glasses, fixed at an angle of 45°. The method of using this instrument is obvious. If the observer moves forward or backward in the straight line AB, until the object B seen by direct vision coincides with another object C, seen by reflection, then a straight line drawn to C from the point at which he stands, as D, when the coincidence takes place will be perpendicular to AB.—Out of square. (a) Not drawn or cut to right angles. (b) Out of order; out of the way; irregular; incorrect or incorrect.

Herodotus, in his Melpomene, scorneth them that make Europe and Asia equal, affirming that Europe . . . passeth them in latitude, wherein he speaketh not greatly out of square. R. Eden, tr. of Francisco Lopez (First Books on America, ed. Arber, p. 346).

In St. Paul's time the integrity of Rome was famous; Corinth many ways reprov'd; they of Galatia much more out of square.

Hooker, Keble's Polity, iii. 1.

Reducing squares, a method of copying designs or drawings on a different scale. The original is divided into squares by lines drawn at right angles to one another. The surface on which the copy is to be made is divided into the same number of squares, smaller or larger, according to the scale desired, and the lines of the design are drawn on the squares of the copy in the same relative positions that they occupy in the original. Instead of marking the original design with lines, a frame in which crossed threads or wires are set may be laid over it; or such a frame may be used in a similar way in drawing a landscape or any other subject from the original.—Rising-square, a square having a tongue and two arms at right angles to it, used in molding the floor-timbers in wooden ships. The tongue is in width equal to the sliding size of the keel; and the rent and throat of the floor-timbers are squared across it, the risings of the floor at the head being squared across the arms. The timber-mold applied to the seating on the tongue and rising on the arm gives the shape of one side of the floor-timber; the mold reversed gives the other.—Selling square (milid), a square body of troops; a body in which the ranks and files are equal.—Square of an anchor, the upper part of the shank.—Square of sense. See the quotation.

I profess

My selfe an enemy to all other loyes,
Which the most pretious square of sense professes,
And thus I am alone felicitate
In your deere Highnesse lone.

Shak., LEAR (folio 1673), i. 1. 76.

[This phrase has been variously interpreted by commentators: Warburton refers it to the four nobler senses—sight, hearing, taste, and smell; Johnson makes it mean "compass or comprehension of sense"; R. G. White, "the entire domain of sensation"; Schmidt, "the closest symmetry of reason, the most normal and intelligent mode of thinking"; To break no square, to make no difference. See the next phrase.—To break or breed square, to break the square, to throw things out of due or just relation and harmony; make a difference.—To reduce the square (milid). See reduce.—To see how the squares go, to see how the game proceeds, or how matters are going on.

At length they, having an opportunity, resolved to send Mr. Winslow, with what heaver they had ready, into England, to see how ye square went.

Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 203.

squaring-boards (skwâr'ing-bórdz), n. pl. Thick planks of seasoned wood truly squared, used by bookbinders for cutting boards for single book-covers, or for the square cutting of paper with rough edges.

squaring-plow (skwâr'ing-plou), n. In book-binding, a hand-tool used to trim the edges of books.

squaring-shears (skwâr'ing-shérz), n. sing. and pl. 1. In sheet-metal work, a machine for cutting and tracing sheets of tin-plate. It has an adjustable table with a scale and gage.—2. In bookbinding, a pivoted knife for trimming the edges of piles of paper or book-sheets.

squarrose (skwâr'ós), a. [*< LL. *squarrosus, given in Festus as an adj. applied to persons whose skin scales off from uncleanness; prob. an error for squamosus, scaly, scurfy: see squamose.*] 1. In bot., rough with spreading processes; thickly set with divergent or recurved, commonly rigid, bracts or leaves, as the involucres of various Compositæ and the stems of some mosses; of leaves, bracts, etc., so disposed as to form a squarrose surface. Also squarrous.—2. In entom., laciniate and prominent: noting a margin with many long thin projections divided by deep incisions, the fringe-like edge so formed being elevated.

squarrous (skwâr'ús), a. [*< LL. *squarrosus: see squarrose.*] 1. In bot., same as squarrose, 1.—2. In entom., irregularly covered with scales, which stand up from the surface at various angles, resembling scurf.

squarrulose (skwâr'ú-lós), a. [Dim. of squarrose.] In bot., somewhat squarrose; finely squarrose.

squarson (skwâr'sn), n. [< squ(ire) + (p)arson.] One who is at the same time a landed proprietor and a beneficed clergyman. [Ludicrous, Eng.]

The death has lately occurred of Rev. W. H. Hoare, of Oakfield, Sussex. . . . Mr. Hoare, it is said, was the original of the well-known expression, invented by Bishop Wilberforce, Squarson, by which he meant a landed proprietor in holy orders.

Living Church, Aug. 25, 1888.

He held the sacrosanct position of a squarson, being at once Squire and Parson of the parish of Little Wentley.

A. Lang, Mark of Cain, ix.

squarsonage (skwâr'son-áj), n. [< squarson + -age.] The residence of one who is at once squire and parson. [Ludicrous, Eng.]

She left the gray old squarsonage and went to London.

A. Lang, Mark of Cain, ix.

One of the reapers, approaching, . . . made me apprehend that with the next step I should be squashed to death under his foot.
Swift, Gulliver's Travels, II. 1.

II. intrans. To splash; make a splashing sound. [Prov. or colloq.]

Wet through and through; with her feet squeaking and squashing in her shoes whenever she moved.
Dickens, Hard Times, xl.

squash<sup>1</sup> (skwosh'), n. [< squash<sup>1</sup>, v.] 1. Something soft and easily crushed; something unripe and soft; especially, an unripe pea-pod.

Not yet old enough for a man, nor young enough for a boy; as a squash is before 'tis a pease-cod.
Shak., T. N., I. 5. 166.

2. Something that has been crushed into a soft mass.

It seemed churlish to pass him by without a sign, especially as he took off his squash of a hat to me.
Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 80.

3. A sudden fall of a heavy soft body; a shock of soft bodies.

My fall was stopped by a terrible squash, that sounded louder to my ears than the catnet of Niagara.
Swift, Gulliver's Travels, II. 7.

Lemon squash. See lemon-squash.

squash<sup>2</sup> (skwosh'), n. [An abbr. of squatter-squash, squonter-squash, < Amer. Ind. askuta-squash; asquash, pl. of asq, raw, green.] The fruit of an annual plant of the gourd kind, belonging to one of several species of the genus Cucurbita; also, the plant itself. The very numerous and divergent varieties of the cultivated squash are reduced by good authority to three species — C. maxima, the great or winter squash; C. Pepo, including the pumpkin and also a large part of the ordinary squashes; and C. moschata, the musky, China, or Barbary squash. The first has a club-shaped, pear-shaped, or long cylindrical fruit with a glaucous-whitish surface. The other squashes may for practical purposes be divided into summer and winter kinds. Among the latter is the C. maxima, of which the fruit is spheroidal in form and often of great size, sometimes weighing 240 pounds. A variety of this is the crowned or turban squash, whose fruit has a circular projection at the top, the mark of the adherent calyx-tube. Other winter squashes are of moderate size, and commonly either narrowed toward the base into a neck which in the "crook-neck" is curved to one side, or egg-shaped and pointed at the ends, as in the (Boston) marrow, long a standard in America, or the still better Hubbard squash. The winter squash can be preserved through the season. The summer squash has a very short vine, hence sometimes called bush-squash. Its fruit is smaller, and is either a crook-neck or depressed in form, somewhat hemispherical with a scalloped border (see rimbin); it is colored yellow, white, green, or green and white. Squashes are more grown in America than elsewhere, but also, especially the winter squashes, in continental Europe, and generally in temperate and tropical climates. In Great Britain the only ordinary squash is the vegetable marrow (see marrow), or succedo gourd. The summer squash is eaten before maturity, prepared by boiling. The winter squash is boiled or roasted; in France and the East it is largely used in soups and ragouts, in America often made into pies. It is also used as food for animals.

Akutasquash, their Vine-apple, which the English, from them, call Squashes.

Roger Williams, Key to Lang. of America (ed. 1643), xvi. [(Hodge Isl. Soc. Coll.).]

Squashes, but more truly squonter-squashes; a kind of mellow, or rather gourd.

Joselyn, N. E. Rarities (1672), Amer. Antiq. Soc., IV. 103.

squash<sup>3</sup> (skwosh'), n. [Abbr. of musquash (like coon from racon, or possum from apossom).] The musquash or muskrat, Fiber zibethicus.

The smell of our weasels, and ermines, and polecats is fragrant itself when compared to that of the squash and the skink.
Goldsmith, Hist. Earth (ed. 1822), III. 94.

squash-beetle (skwosh'be'tl), n. The striped cucumber-beetle, Diabrotica vittata, or a similar species, which feeds upon the squash and related plants. See Diabrotica.

squash-borer (skwosh'bor'er), n. The larva of an aspidian or sesiid moth, Trachilium cucurbitae, which bores the stems of squashes in the United States.

squash-bug (skwosh'bug), n. An ill-smelling heteropterous insect, Anasa tristis, of the family Coreidae, found commonly on the squash and other cucurbitaceous plants in North America. There are one or two annual generations, and the bug hibernates as an adult. Throughout its life it feeds upon the leaves of these plants, and is a noted pest.

squasher (skwosh'er), n. [< squash<sup>1</sup> + -er.] One who or that which squashes. [Colloq.]

squash-gourd (skwosh'görd), n. Same as squash<sup>2</sup>.

[Prev. Eng.]

sneasiness (skwé'zi-nes), n. Queasiness; qualmishness; nausea.

A sneasiness and rising up of the heart against any mean, vulgar, or mechanical condition of men.

Hammond, Works, IV. 614.

sneasy (skwé'zi), a. [Also squeazy; formerly squeazy; a var. of queasy with intensive s-, as in splash for plash<sup>1</sup>, squench for quench: see queasy.] Queasy; qualmish; sneamish; scrupulous.

His own nice and sneasy stomach, still weary of his last meal, puts him into a study whether he should eat of his best dish or nothing.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 425.

The women are few here, squeazy and formal, and little skilled in amusing themselves or other people.

Gray, Letters, I. 202.

squeegee (skwéj), v. and n. A dialectal form of squeeze. Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, II. 530.

squeegee (skwé'jé), n. [A form of squillgee, simulating squeegee for squeegee.] 1. Naut., same as squillgee.—2. In photog., a stout strip of soft rubber set longitudinally in a wooden back which serves as a handle, and beyond which the rubber projects. It is used for expressing moisture from paper prints, for bringing a film into close contact with a glass or mount, etc., and is also made in the form of a roller of soft rubber, much resembling a printers' inking-roller.

squeegee (skwé'jé), v. t. [squeegee, n.] To treat with a squeegee or squillgee.

A glacé finish may easily be obtained by squeegeeing the washed print on a polished plate of hard rubber.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LX. 53.

squeezability (skwé-zá-bil'i-ti), n. [squeezable + -ity (see -ility).] The quality or state of being squeezable. Imp. Dict.

squeezable (skwé'zá-bl), a. [squeeze + -able.] 1. Capable or admitting of being squeezed; compressible.—2. Figuratively, capable of being constrained or coerced: as, a squeezable government. [Colloq.]

You are too versatile and too squeezable; . . . you take impressions too readily.

Seavage, Reuben Medlicott, I. 9. (Davies.)

The peace-of-mind-at-any-price disposition of that [Gladstone] Cabinet had rendered it squeezable to any extent.

Love, Bismarck, II. 230.

squeeze (skwéz), v.; pret. and pp. squeezed, ppr. squeezing. [Early mod. E. also squize, squise, E. dial. also squizen (also perversely squeege); with intensive s-, < ME. queisen, squeeze, < AS. ewēsan, ewīsan (in comp. tō-ewīsan, tō-ewēsan), crush; cf. Sw. qvāsa, squeeze, bruise; D. kwetsen = MHG. quetzen, G. quetschen, G. dial. quetzen, crush, squash, bruise; MLG. quatern, quettern, squash, bruise; Goth. kwistjan, destroy; Lith. gaisiti, destroy.] I. trans. 1. To press forcibly; subject to strong pressure; exert pressure upon: as, to squeeze a sponge; hence, to bruise or crush by the application of pressure: as, to squeeze one's fingers in a vise; apply force or pressure to for the purpose of extracting something: as, to squeeze a lemon.

O Phylax, spare
My squeezed Son, least from herself she start.
Loose, loose the Buckle! If the time he come
That I must die, at least afford me room.
J. Beaumont, Psycho, III. 206.
The people submit quietly when their governor squeezes their purses. Poocke, Description of the East, II. 1. 161.
The ingredients for punch were all in readiness; but no one would squeeze the oranges till he came.
Fiddling, Joseph Andrews, I. 13.

2. To press in sympathy or affection, or as a silent indication of interest or emotion: as, to squeeze one's hand.

He is said to be the first that made love by squeezing the hand.
Steele, Spectator, No. 109.

With my left hand I took her right — did she squeeze it? I think she did.
Thackeray, Fitz-Boodle Papers, Dorothea.

3. To produce or procure by the application of pressure; express; extract: usually with out: as, to squeeze consent from an official.

Queise out the jus. Reliq. Antiq., I. 302.
When day appeared, . . . I began again to squeeze out the matter [from a wound], & to anoint it with a little salve which I had.
Guevara, Letters (tr. by Helowes, 1577), p. 116.

He [Canute] squeezed out of the English, though now his subjects, not his Enemies, 72, some say 82, thousand pound.
Milton, Hist. Eng., vi.

They can squeeze Bourdeaux out of a sloe, and draw Champagno from an apple. Addison, Tatler, No. 131.

4. To thrust forcibly; force: with into, or other similar adjunct: as, to squeeze a gown into a box.

He [Webster] has not the condensing power of Shakespeare, who squeezed meaning into a phrase with an hydraulic press.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 318.

Schneider had provided himself at the Greenland ports with the entire costume of the Eskimo belle, and, being a small man, was able to squeeze himself into the garments.
A. W. Greely, Arctic Service, p. 176.

5. To harass or oppress by exactions or the like.

The little officers oppress the people; the great officers squeeze them. Poocke, Description of the East, I. 171.

The whole convict system is a money-making affair; . . . they all just naturally squeeze the convict.

The Century, XI. 221.
6. To obtain a facsimile impression of on paper, by means of water and rubbing or beating. See squeezee, n., 3.

But the overhang of the rock makes it extremely difficult to squeeze satisfactorily. Athenaeum, No. 3284, p. 455.
Squeezed-in vessel, a vessel of pottery or glass whose form indicates that it has been pressed in on opposite sides, as if nipped by the fingers. It is a common form in Roman glass bottles; and many Japanese flasks of stone-ware also have this shape.

II. intrans. 1. To press; press, push, or force one's way through or into some tight, narrow, or crowded place; pass by pressing or pushing.

Many a public minister comes empty in; but, when he has crammed his guts, he is fain to squeeze hard before he can get off.
Sir R. L'Estrange.

2. To pass (through a body) under the application of pressure.

A concave sphere of gold filled with water, and soldered up, has, upon pressing the sphere with great force, let the water squeeze through it and stand all over its outside in multitudes of small drops like dew, without bursting or cracking the body of the gold.
Newton, Opticks, II. 3, prop. 8.

squeeze (skwēz), n. [< squeeze, v.] 1. Pressure, or an application of pressure; a hug or embrace; a friendly, sympathetic, or loving grasp: as, a squeeze of the hand.

Had a very affectionate squeeze by the hand, and a fine compliment in a corner. Gray, Letters, I. 239.

The Squire shook him heartily by the hand, and congratulated him on his safe arrival at Headlong Hall. The doctor returned the squeeze, and assured him that the congratulation was by no means misplaced.
Phaeton, Headlong Hall, III.

2. Crush; crowding.

The pair of MacWhirters journeyed from Tours, . . . and, after four-and-twenty hours of squeeze in the diligence, presented themselves at nightfall at Madame Smolensk's.
Thackeray, Philip, xvi.

3. A cast or an impression, as of an inscription or a coin, produced by forcing some plastic material into the hollows or depressions of the surface; especially, such a facsimile or impression made by applying sheets of wet unsized paper to the object to be copied, and thoroughly passing over the sheets with light blows of a stiff brush, so as to force the paper into every inequality. The paper, upon drying, hardens, yielding a perfect and durable negative, or reversed copy, of the original. This method is employed by archaeologists for securing faithful transcripts of ancient inscriptions.

It is to him that we owe the copies and squeezes of the Nabatean Inscriptions. Contemporary Rev., LIV. 302.

Armed, therefore, with a stock of photographic plates, and with the far more essential stock of paper for making moulds or squeezes from the stone, I began work on the temples of Thebes. Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 297.

squeezer (skwē'zér), n. [< squeeze + -er.] 1. One who or that which squeezes. Specifically—(a) In iron-working, a machine employed in getting the puddled ball into shape, or shingling it, without hammering. (See puddling.) Squeezers are of two kinds, reciprocating and rotary. The essential feature of the reciprocating form is that a movable arm or lever works against a corresponding fixed jaw, the former representing the

a, ridged eccentric casing; A, ridged roller. The ball of metal enters at c, in the direction shown by the arrow, and emerges at c'.

hammer, the latter the anvil, of the old method of shingling with the hammer. In the rotary squeezer the puddled ball is brought into shape by being passed between a cast-iron cylinder and a cylindrical casing, the former being placed eccentrically within the latter so that the distance between their surfaces gradually diminishes in the direction of the rotation. The ball, being introduced at the widest part of the opening, is carried forward and finally delivered at the narrower end, reduced in size and ready for rolling. (b) In sheet-metal working, a crimping-machine for forcing the tops and covers of the cans over the cylinders which form the sides of the cans. (c) A lemon-squeezer.

2. pl. A kind of playing-cards in which the face-value of each card is shown in the upper left-hand corner, and can readily be seen by squeezing the cards slightly apart, without displaying the hand.—Alligator squeezer. Same as crocodile squeezer.—Crocodile squeezer, a peculiar form of squeezer, having a long projecting upper jaw armed with teeth. It is used in the manufacture of iron.

squeezing (skwē'zing), n. [Verbal n. of squeeze, v.] 1. The act of pressing; compression.—2. That which is forced out by or as by pressure; hence, oppressive exaction.

The dogs and squeezings of the brain.
Tops, Essay on Criticism, I. 607.

squeezing-box (skwē'zing-boks), n. In ceram., a cylinder of metal, through an opening in the bottom of which plastic clay is forced in a continuous ribbon of any desired section, to form lugs, handles, etc.

squeezyt, a. See squeasy.

squelch (skwelch), n. [Formerly also squelsh; prob. a var., with intensive prefix s-, of E. dial. quellch, a blow, bang.] A crushing blow; a heavy fall. [Colloq.]

But Ralpho, who had now begun
T' adventure resurrection
From heavy squelch, had had not up.
S. Butler, Hudibras, II. 1033.

squelch (skwelch), v. [< Squelch, n.] I. trans. 1. To crush down; stamp on as if squeezing out something liquid; put an end to. [Colloq.]

'Tis too, this Fat Bishop hath so overlaid me,
So squelch'd and squeezed me.
Middleton, Game at Chess, v. 3.

Here, all about the fields, is the wild carrot. You cut off its head, just before it seeds, and you think you have squelched it; but this is just what Nature . . . wanted you to do.
J. Burroughs, The Century, XIX. 688.

2. To disconcert; discomfit; put down. [Colloq.]

Take glaucous shamefaced at the nosegay in his button-hole, and was squelched.
J. W. Palmer, After his Kind, p. 120.

II. intrans. To be crushed. [Colloq.]

squelet, v. A Middle English form of squal.

squench (skwoneh), v. t. [A var., with intensive prefix s-, of quench.] To quench. Beau. and Fl. [Obsolete or vulgar.]

squerelt, squerrelt, squerrilt, n. Obsolete forms of squirrel.

squeteague (skwo-tēg'), n. [Also squete, squite, squit; of Amer. Ind. origin.] A salt-water scianoid fish, Cynoscion regalis (formerly Otolithus regalis), also called weakfish, sea-salmon, and sea-trout in common with some other members of the same genus. It is silvery, darker above, with many irregular, small, dark blotches tending to form oblique undulating bars. It is common from Cape Cod southward, and is a valued food-fish. A more distinctly marked fish of this kind is C. maculatus, the spotted squeteague, weakfish, or sea-trout, of more southerly distribution. See Cynoscion, and cut under weakfish.

squib (skwib), v.; pret. and pp. squibbed, ppr. squibbing. [A var. of **squip*, < ME. squippen, a var. of swip (ME. swippen), move swiftly, sweep, dash: see swip, swipe.] I. intrans. 1. To move swiftly and irregularly.

A battered unmarried beau, who squibs about from place to place.
Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, lxxviii.

2. [< squib, n., 3.] To make a slight, sharp report, like that of an exploding squib.—3. [< squib, n., 4.] To resort to the use of squibs, or potty lampoons.

II. trans. 1. To throw (in or out) suddenly; explode.

Thou wouldst neuer squib out any new Salt-petro Iestes against honest Tucca.
Dekker, Humorous Poet (Works, ed. Pearson, I. 235).

He [Mr. Brian Twyne] squibs in this parenthesis.
Fuller, Hist. Cambridge University, I. § 52.

2. [< squib, n., 4.] To attack in squibs; lampoon.

squib (skwib), n. [< squib, v.] 1. A ball or tube filled with gunpowder, sent or fired swiftly through the air or along the ground, exploding somewhat like a rocket.

Like a Squib it falls,
Or fire-winged shaft, or sulph'ry Powder Balls.
Sydney, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, I. 2.

Nor nimble squib is soon to make afraid
The gentlewomen.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, Prol.

So squibs and crackers fly into the air,
Then, only breaking with a noise, they vanish
In stench and smoke. Ford, Broken Heart, II. 2.

2. A reel, rush, quill, or roll of paper filled with a priming of gunpowder; a tube of some kind used to set off a charge of gunpowder, as at the bottom of a drill-hole. Also called mote, train, and match.—3. A fire-cracker, especially one broken in the middle so that when it is fired the charge explodes without a loud report.—4. A petty lampoon; a short satirical writing or sketch holding up a person or thing to ridicule.

Allowing that . . . [the play] succeeds, there are a hundred squibs flying all about to prove that it should not have succeeded. Goldsmith, Polite Learning, x.

5t. One who writes lampoons or squibs; a petty satirist; a paltry, trifling fellow.

The squibs are those who, in the common phrase of the word, are called libellers, lampooners, and pamphleteers.
Steele, Tatler, No. 88.

6. A kind of cheap tuff, made of treacle.

And there we had a shop, too, for lollipops and squibs.
Hood, Lines by a Schoolboy.

squibbish (skwib'ish), n. [< squib + -ish.] Flashy; light. T. Mace, Music's Monument. (Davies.)

squid (skwid), n. [Origin unknown.] 1. A kind of cuttlefish or calamary; a dibranchiate cephalopod with ten arms, especially of the family Loliginidae or Tentaculidae. The name is most frequently given to the small, slender calamaries, a few inches long and with a caudal fin, which are much used as bait, but is extended (with or without a qualifying term) to many other species of different genera and families, some of which, as the giant squids, are the largest of cephalopods. See cuts under Architeuthis calamary, Demoteuthis, Loliginidae, Scipoda, and Spirula, and compare those under Dibranchiata, cuttlefish, and Scipia.

2. An artificial bait or lure of metal, ivory, etc., used in angling or trolling for fish, often simply a fish-hook on the shank of which a mass of lead is melted in cylindrical or tapering form to imitate a squid (def. 1).—False squids, the Loligopsidae.—Flying squids, the Ommastrephidae.—Giant squids, the very large cephalopods of the genus Architeuthis, as A. harveyi of the Atlantic coast of North America, among those called devil-fish. See cut under Architeuthis.—Long-armed squids, the Chiroteuthidae.—Long-finned squids, species of Loliginidae. See cut under Loliginidae.—Short-finned squids, species of Ommastrephes, as O. illecebrosus, common in New England seas and northward, and a principal source of bait.

squid (skwid), v. i.; pret. and pp. squidged, ppr. squidding. [< squid, n.] To fish with a squid or spoon-bait.

squidding (skwid'ing), n. [Verbal n. of squid, v.] The act, art, or practice of fishing with a squid.

squid-fork (skwid'fôrk), n. An instrument used by fishermen in baiting with a squid.

squid-hound (skwid'hound), n. The striped bass, Roccus lineatus. See cut under bass.

squid-jig (skwid'jig), n. A squid-jigger.

squid-jigger (skwid'jig'er), n. A device for catching squids, consisting of a number of hooks soldered together by the shanks so that the points radiate in all directions. It is dragged or jerked through the water.

squid-jigging (skwid'jig'ing), n. The act of jigging for squids; the use of a squid-jigger; squidging.

squid-thrower (skwid'thrô'er), n. A device, on the principle of the catapult, used in trolling to cast a fishing-line seaward. E. H. Knight.

squieriet, n. An obsolete spelling of squyry.

squiggle (skwig'l), v. i.; pret. and pp. squiggled, ppr. squiggling. [Appar. a var., with intensive prefix s-, of **quiggle*, E. dial. quicgle, a var. of wiggle; see wiggle.] 1. To shake a fluid about in the mouth with the lips closed. [Prov. Eng.]—2. To move about like an eel; squirm; wriggle. [Colloq., U. S.]

squill<sup>1</sup> (skwil'jô), n. [Also squillagee, squillage, also squegee, squegee (see squegee); origin obscure; perhaps connected with swill, swile, wash, rinse; but the term is not explained.]

1. Naut.: (a) An implement somewhat resembling a wooden hoe, with an edge of india-rubber or thick leather, used to scrape the water from wet docks. (b) A small swab. (c) A becket and toggle used to confine a studding-sail while setting it.—2. One of several implements constructed like the nautical implement above defined (1 (a)), used for washing glass, in photographic work, etc. See squegee, 2.

squill<sup>2</sup> (skwil'jô), v. i. [< squillage, n.] Naut., to scrape (the wet docks of a ship) with a squill<sup>1</sup>.

The washing, swabbing, squillagee, etc., lasts, or is made to last, until eight o'clock, when breakfast is ordered, fore and aft.

squill<sup>3</sup>-toggle (skwil'jô-tog'l), n. A toggle with a small line fastened to it, used to secure a strap round a studding-sail while being set, so that by pulling out the squill<sup>3</sup> when the sail is hoisted far enough the sail is released.

squill<sup>4</sup> (skwil'), n. [*< ME. squille, squille, squyle, squyle, < OF. squille, scille, F. squille, scille = Sp. esquila = Pg. scilla = It. squilla, < L. squilla, scilla, squill, = Gr. σκίλλα, squill, perhaps for *σκιδα (as equiv. σκίφος for *σκίφος), and so called from its splitting easily into scales, < σκίζω, split: see schism.*] 1. The medicinal bulb of Urginea Scilla, or the plant itself; the officinal squill. See Urginea.—2. Any plant of the genus Scilla (which see). S. nutans is commonly called bluebell, or wild hyacinth. The spring squill, S. verna, and the autumn squill, S. autumnalis, are small European wild flowers of no great merit in cultivation. The star-flowered squill, S. amara, is a distinct early species, the flowers indigo-blue with large yellowish-green ovary, less attractive than the species following. The early squill, S. bifolia, produces rich masses of dark-blue flowers very early in the spring. The Spanish squill, S. Hispanica (S. campanulata), is a fine species of early summer, with a strong pyramidal raceme of large pendent usually light blue flowers; also called Spanish bluebell. The Italian squill, S. Italica, has pale-blue flowers with intensely blue stamens. The pyramidal or Peruvian squill, S. Peruviana, not from Peru, but from the Mediterranean region, has pale-blue flowers with white stamens, the flowers very numerous in a regular pyramid. The Siberian squill, S. Sibirica (S. amara), not from Siberia, but from southern Russia, is a very choice small early-flowering species, the blossom of a peculiar porcelain blue. These are all hardly except the pyramidal squill.—Chinese squill, a species of Scilla, S. Chinesica, once classed as Barnardina.—Compound syrup of squill. See syrup.—Oxymel of squill. See oxymel.—Pancreatic squill, a variety of the officinal squill said to be milder in its action.—Roman squill, the Roman hyacinth, Hyacinthus Romanus, once classed as Scilla, also as Bellevia.—Wild squill, the American wild hyacinth, or eastern camass, Camassia (Scilla) Fraseri.

squill<sup>5</sup> (skwil'), n. [< L. squilla, scilla, a small fish of the lobster kind, a prawn, shrimp, so called from a supposed resemblance to the bulb or plant of the same name: see squill.]

1. A stomatopod crustacean of the genus Squilla or family Squillidae; a mantis-shrimp or scud-fish. See cuts under mantis-shrimp and Squillidae.—2. An insect so called from its resemblance to the preceding; a mantis. Also called squill-insect.

Squilla (skwil'jô), n. [NL. (Fabricius), < L. squilla, scilla, a prawn: see squill.] 1. The representative genus of Squillidae, containing such crustaceans as S. mantis, the common mantis-shrimp or locust-shrimp. The southern squill of the United States is Coronis glabriscula. See cuts under mantis-shrimp and Squillidae.—2. [L. c.] Same as squill, 1.—3. [L. c.] Same as squill, 2.

The Squilla, an insect, differs but little from the fish Squilla.

squinance<sup>2</sup> (skwin'an-si), n. [Also contr. squincy, squinsky; < ME. squinacie, squinacie, < OF. esquinacie, squinacie, quinsky: see quinsky.] 1. Quinsky.

Diseases that be verie perillous: . . . to wit, the Plenresle, Squinacie, inflammation, sharpo Feuer, or Apoplexie. Guerara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 235.

2. The quinskywort.

squinance<sup>3</sup>-berry (skwin'an-si-ber'i), n. Same as quinsky-berry.

squinance<sup>4</sup>-wort (skwin'an-si-wôrt), n. Same as quinskywort.

squince<sup>1</sup>, n. [Early mod. E. squynce; var. of squincy, etc.] Same as squintance.

Diseases and sicknesses, as squynce.

Str T. Elyot, The Governour, III. 22.

squinch<sup>1</sup> (skwinch), n. [A var. of squince.] In arch., a small arch, or a series of arches, corbeled out, thrown across an angle, as in a square tower to support the side of a superimposed octagon. In Western architecture it is frequent as performing the function of the Eastern pendentive. The application of the term may be due to the resemblance of this structure to a corner cupboard, which was also called squinch or seone. See cut in next column.

Squinch.

squincy, n. [A contraction of squintance: see squintance, quinsky.] Quinsky.

Shall not we be suspected for the murder,

And choke with a hempen squincy?

Randolph, Jealous Lovers, III. 14.

squint-eyed, n. A squinting eye.

squint (skwink), v. i. [A dial. form of wink: see squint and wink.] To wink. [Prov. Eng.] squinty (skwin'i), v. i. [Formerly also squiny: see squint.] To squint. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

I remember thine eyes well enough. Dost thou squint at me?

Shak., Lear, IV. 6. 140.

squint (skwint), a. and n. [Not found in ME., except as in asquint, askew; appar. an extension of the obs. or dial. squith, squean, sken, prob. connected with D. schuinen, slant, slope, schuini, slant, sloping; perhaps associated with E. dial. squink, wink, partly a var. of wink, partly < Sw. svika, shrink, flinch, nasalized form of svika, balk, flinch, fail; cf. Dan. svigte, bend, fail, forsake; AS. swican, escape, avoid. The history of the word is meager, and the forms appar. related are more or less involved.]

1. Looking different ways; characterized by non-coincidence of the optic axes; affected with strabismus: said of eyes.

Some things that are not heard

He mutters to himself, and his squint eye

Casts towards the Moone, as should his wits there lye.

Heywood, Dialogues (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, VI. 190).

2. That looks or is directed obliquely; looking askance; indirect; oblique; sinister.

The pleasure I shall live in, and the freedom,

Without the squint eye of the law upon me,

Or prating liberty of tongues that envy!

Fletcher, Rule a Wife, III. 1.

I incline to hope, rather than fear,

And gladly banish squint suspicion.

Squint quoin, in arch., an external oblique angle.

II. n. 1. An affection of the eyes, consisting in non-coincidence of the optic axes; a squint eye; strabismus (which see).

He's blue eyes, and not to be called a squint, though a little cast he's certainly got.

Wood, The Lost Heir.

2. An oblique or furtive look; a furtive glance; hence (colloquially), a leaning, an inclination: as, he had a decided squint toward democracy.—3. In arch., an oblique opening through the walls of some old churches, usually having for its object to enable a person in the transepts or aisles to see the elevation of the host at the high altar. The usual situation for a squint is on one or both sides of the chancel arch; but they are also found in other positions, though always directed toward an altar. Generally they are not above a yard high, and 2 feet wide, but sometimes they form narrow arches 10 or 12 feet in height, as at Minster-Lovel, Oxfordshire. The name hagioscope is sometimes applied to them.—Braid's squint, the turning of the eyes simultaneously upward and inward, as if trying to look at the middle of one's own forehead, as a means of producing a hypnotic state.

squint (skwint), v. [< squint, n.] I. intrans.

1. To look askew, or with the eyes differently directed; look askance.

He gets a creak in his neck oft-times with squinting up at windows and balconies.

Brome, Sparagus Garden, III. 4.

Some can squint when they will.

Bacon.

2. To be affected with strabismus.—3. To run or be directed obliquely; have an indirect reference or bearing.

Not a period of this epistle but squints towards another over against it.

Pope.

Not meaning . . .
His pleasure or his good alone,
But squinting partly at my own.
Couper, To Rev. W. Bull, June 22, 1782.

II. trans. 1. To render squint or oblique; affect with strabismus.

Let him but see
An unsway'd eye, not squinted with affections.
Heywood, Dialogues (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, VI. 226).
He gives the web and the pin, squints the eye, and makes the hare-lip. Shak., Lear, III. 4. 122.

2. To turn, east, or direct obliquely.

Perkin . . . raised his Siege, and marched to Taunton; beginning already to squint one eye upon the crown and another upon the sanctuary.

Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII., p. 183.

squinter (skwin'tér), n. [< squint + -er]. One who squints; a cross- or squint-eyed person.

I pass over certain difficulties about double images, drawn from the perceptions of a few squinters.
W. James, Mind, XII. 523, note.

squint-eyed (skwint'éd), a. 1. Having eyes that squint; having eyes with non-coincident axes.
N. Bailey, tr. of Colloquies of Erasmus, I. 103.
—2. Oblique; indirect; sinister; malignant.

This is such a false and squint-eyed praise,
Which, seeming to look upwards on his glories,
Looks down upon my fears.
Sir J. Denham, The Sophy. (Latham.)

3. Looking obliquely or by side-glances: as, squint-eyed jealousy or envy.

The hypocrite . . . looks squint-eyed, aiming at two things at once: the satisfying his own lusts, and that the world may not be aware of it.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 404.

squintifegot (skwin-tí-fé-gō), a. [< squint +
-fego, an arbitrary termination.] Squinting.

The timbrel, and the squintifego maid
Of Isis, awe thee.
Dryden, tr. of Persius's Satires, v. 271.

squinting (skwin'ting), n. [Verbal n. of squint.]
The act or habit of looking squint; strabismus.

squintingly (skwin'ting-li), adv. With squint look; by side-glances.

squint-minded (skwint'mín'ded), a. Deceitful; crooked-minded. Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, II. 34. [Rare.]

squinty, v. i. See squinty.

squir (skwér), v. t. and i. [Also squirr; a var.
of **quir* for whirr: see whirr.] To throw with a jerk. [Prov. Eng.]

I saw him squir away his watch a considerable way into the Thames. Budgett, Spectator, No. 77.

Boys squir pieces of tin or flat stones across ponds or brooks to make what are denominated ducks and drakes.
Halliwell.

squialty (skwí'al-ti), n. [< squirel + -ally, after the analogy of loyalty.] Same as squirearchy. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, I. xviii.
[Rare.]

squirarchy, n. See squirearchy.

squire (skwír), n. [Also dial. square; early mod. E. also squier; < ME. squier, sqyer, sqier, sqier, seyere, by apheresis from esquire: see esquire.] 1. An esquire; an attendant on a knight.

Thou tolde Grisandolus how he dide laugh before the duke and in the chapel, for the squier that hadde synen his maister, and the dyverse wordes that he hadde spoken.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), III. 428.

The rest are princes, barons, lords, knights, squires,
And gentlemen of blood. Shak., Hen. V., IV. 5. 91.

2. A gentleman who attends upon a lady; an escort; a beam; a gattant.

And eke himselfe had craftily devised
To be her Squire, and do her service well agnised.
Spenser, F. Q., II. i. 21.

3. A person not noble nor a knight, but who has received a grant of arms.—4. In England, a landed proprietor who is also justice of the peace: a term nearly equivalent to lord of the manor, as meaning the holder of most of the land in any neighborhood.—5. In the United States, in country districts and towns, a justice of the peace, a local judge, or other local dignitary: chiefly used as a title.—Broom-squiro.
See the quotation.

"Broom-squires?" "So we call in Berkshire squatters on the moor who live by tying heath into brooms."
Kingsley, Two Years Ago, xiv.

Squire of dames, a man very attentive to women and much in their company.

Marry, there I'm call'd
The Squire of Dames, or Servant of the Sex.
Massinger, Emperor of the East, I. 2.

Squire of the body, a personal attendant, originally on a knight, but later on a courtier; a pimp.—Squire of the pad, a footpad; a highwayman.

Sometimes they are Squires of the Pad, and now and then borrow a little money upon the King's High Way, to recruit their losses at the Gaming House.
Tom Brown, Works (ed. 1705).

squire (skwír), *v. t.; pret. and pp. squired, ppr.
squiring.* [< ME. "squiren, squeren; < squirel, n." 1. To attend and wait upon, as a squire his lord.—2. To attend, as a gentleman a lady; wait upon or attend upon in the manner of a squire; escort.

For he squiereth me bothe up and doun,
Yet lastow caught a fals suspencion.
Chaucer, Prologue to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 305.

To squire women about for other folks is as ungrateful an employment as to tell money for other folks.
Wycherley, Country Wife, IV. 3.

squire (skwír), n. An old form of squirel.

squireage (skwír'ij), n. [< squirel + -age.]
The untitled landed gentry; the squires of a country taken collectively. De Morgan, Budgot of Paradoxes, p. 46. [Rare.]

squirearch (skwír'ärk), n. [< squirearch-y.] A member of the squirearchy.

Man is made for his fellow-creatures. I had long been disgusted with the interference of those selfish squire-archs. Bulwer, Caxtons, II. 11.

squirearchal (skwír'är-ki-äl), a. [*< squirearch
+ -al*.] Of or pertaining to a squirearchy.
Imp. Dict.

squirearchical (skwír'är-ki-käl), a. [< squire-arch-y + -ic-al.] Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of squirearchy or a squirearch. Bulwer, My Novel, I. 10.

squirearchy (skwír'är-ki), n. [Also squirarchy; < squirel + Gr. ἀρχία, rule (after analogy of monarchy, etc.).] 1. In England, government by the squires, or "country gentlemen"—that is, the large landed proprietors, most of whom are justices of the peace, and who, before the Reform Bill of 1832, and to a certain extent after it, had great influence in the House of Commons. Hence.—2. The squires themselves collectively.

squireen (skwír'ën'), n. [< squirel + dim. -en, common in Ir. words.] In Ireland, a small landed proprietor: usually contemptuous.

Squireens are persons who, with good long leases or valuable farms, possess incomes of from three to eight hundred a year, who keep a pack of hounds, take out a commission of the peace, sometimes before they can spell (as her ladyship said), and almost always before they know anything of law or justice. Miss Edgeworth, Absentees, VII.

squirehood (skwír'hüd), n. [< squirel + -hood.]
The state of being a squire; the rank or position of a squire. Swift, Letter to the King at Arms.

squirelet, n. An obsolete form of squirrel.

squirelet (skwír'let), n. [< squirel + -let.] A petty squire; a squireling. Carlyle, Misc., III.
56. (Davies.)

squireling (skwír'ling), n. [< squirel + -ling.]
A petty squire; a squirelet.

But to-morrow, if we live,
Our ponderous squire will give A grand political dinner
To half the squirelings near.
Tennyson, Mand, xx. 2.

squirely (skwír'li), a. [< squirel + -ly.] Befitting or characteristic of a squire.

One very fit for this squirely function.

How could that oligarchy [the Southern States of the United States], with its squirely tastes, its free wasteful outdoor life, its love of landed property, and its contempt for manual labour, become a trading community?
The Academy, July 29, 1899, p. 32.

squiship (skwír'ship), n. [< squirel + -ship.]
Same as squirehood. Shelton, tr. of Don Quixote, I. 4. (Latham.)

squiness (skwír'es), n. [< squirel + -ess.] The wife of a squire. Bulwer, Letham, VII. (Davies.)

squirm (skwérn), v. i. [Prob. a var. of squir, throw with a jerk, influenced by association with swurm and worm: see squir.] 1. To wrig-gle or writhe, as an eel or a worm; hence, to writhe mentally.

You never need think you can turn over my old falsehood without a terrible squirming and scattering of the horrid little population that dwells under it.
O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, v.

They [worms in the pupa state] only squirm a little in a feeble way now and then, and grow stiffer, till they can't squirm at all, and then they're mummies, and that's the end of it till the butterflies are born.

Mrs. Whitney, Leslie Goldthwaite, VII.

2. To climb by wriggling; "slim": as, to squirm up a tree.

squirm (skwérn), n. [< squirm, v.] 1. A wriggling motion, like that of a worm or an eel.—
2. Nunt., a twist in a rope.

squirt, v. See squirt.

squirrel (skwúr'ol or skwír'el), n. [Early mod.
E. also squirril, squerrel, squirel, squirl; < ME.

squirrel, sqyrelle, seurel, swerelle, swyrelle, < OF.
esquirel, esceurel, esquirel, esceurel, esceureil, *es-sciurellus (also, after Rom., sciuriolus, sciurellus, esceurellus, corruptly sirogrillus, cirogrillus, expe-riolus, asperiolus, etc.), dim. of L. sciurus, < Gr.

σκίουρος, a squirrel, lit. 'shadow-tailed,' < σκιά, shadow, + οὐρά, tail. For the sense, cf. E. dial.
skug, a squirrel, lit. 'shade': see skug.] 1. A rodent quadruped of the family Sciuridae and genus Sciurus, originally and specifically Sciurus vulgaris of Europe. Squirrels have pointed ears and a long bushy tail; they are of active arboreal habits, and are able to sit up on their hind quarters and use the fore paws like hands. S. vulgaris, called in England skug, is a squirrel 8 or 10 inches long (the tail being nearly European Squirrel (Sciurus vulgaris).

as much more), with an elegant reddish-brown coat, white below, and the ears tufted or pencilled. It lives in trees, is very agile and graceful in its movements, feeds on all kinds of small hard fruits, nests in a hole, hibernates to some extent in the colder latitudes, and brings forth usually three or four young. It is readily tamed, and makes an interesting pet. The North American squirrel nearest to this one is the chickaree, or red squirrel, S. hudsonius.
(See cut under chickaree.) The common gray squirrel of the United States is S. carolinensis. (See cut under Sciurus.) Fox- or cat-squirrels are several large red, gray, or black species of North America. (See cut under fox-squirrel.) North America (including Mexico and Central America) is very rich in squirrels; southern Asia and Africa are less rich, while South America and Europe have each but a single species of Sciurus proper. In the extension of the name squirrel to other genera of the family, the species of Tamias, Spermophilus, and Cynomys are distinguished as ground-squirrels or prairie-squirrels, and some of them are also called warmot-squirrels (see cuts under chipmunk, Spermophilus, out, and prairie-dog);
those of Sciuropterus and Pteromys are flying-squirrels (see cuts under flying-squirrel and Sciuropterus). The scale-tailed squirrels of Africa belong to a different family, Amomastidae. (See cut under Amomastidae.) Certain Australian marsupials, as phalangers or petaurists, which resemble squirrels, are improperly so called. (See cut under Aerobates.) Some Sciuridae have other vernacular names, as skug, asupan, laguan, jelarang, hakee, chick-aree, yopher, ried, misik, prairie-dog, weikowitch, etc.; but squirrel, without a qualifying term, is practically confined to the genus Sciurus, all the many members of which resemble one another too closely to be mistaken. See the technical names, and cut under Sciurus.

2. In cotton-manuf., one of the small card-covered rollers used with the large roller of a carding-machine. Also called urchin.—Barking squirrel, the prairie-dog; an early name of this animal as brought to notice by Lewis and Clarke in 1814.—
Burrowing squirrel, Lewis and Clarke's name (1814) of a prairie-dog, or some related prairie-squirrel.—Chipping squirrel, the chipmunk.—Federation squirrel, the thirteen-lined spermophile, or striped gopher: so called in allusion to the thirteen stripes of the flag of the original States of the American Union. S. L. Mitchell, 1821. See cut under Spermophilus.—Hunt the squirrel. See hunt. (See also flying-squirrel, prairie-squirrel, sugar-squirrel.)

squirrel-bot (skwúr'el-bot), n. A bot-fly, Cu-thyra cinasculator, whose larvae infest the genital and axillary regions of various squirrels and gophers in the United States, particularly the scrotum and testicles of the male of Tamias striatus, the striped chipmunk.

squirrel-corn (skwúr'el-körn), n. A pretty spring wild flower, Dicentra (Dicentra) Canadensis, of eastern North America. It has elegant dissected leaves, graceful racemes of a few cream-colored heart-shaped blossoms, and separate yellow tubers which resemble kernels of Indian corn. See Dicentra. Less commonly called turkey-corn.

squirrel-cup (skwúr'el-kup), n. The hepatica or liverleaf.

squirrel-fish (skwúr'el-fish), n. 1. Any fish of the family Holocentridæ, and especially of the genus Holocentrus. The numerous species are remarkable for the development of sharp spines almost everywhere on the surface of the body. The name refers to the noise they make when taken out of the water, which suggests the bark of a squirrel. H. pentacanthus of the West Indies, occasional on the United States coast, is chiefly of a bright-red color, with streaks shining lengthwise; its bright tints and quick movements make it one of the most conspicuous denizens of rocky tide-pools.
See cut under Holocentridæ.

2. The serrano, Diplectrum fasciculare, distinguished by the segregation of the serrae at the angle of the preoperculum into two groups. It is common in the West Indies, and also along the southern United States coast to North Carolina.—3. A local name of the pinfish, Lagodon rhomboides.

squirrel-grass (skwūr'el-grās), n. Same as squirreltail.

squirrel-hake (skwūr'el-hāk), n. A gadoid fish, Phycis chuss; the white hake. See chuss, hake 2, and cut under Phycis.

squirrel-hawk (skwūr'el-hāk), n. The ferruginous rough-legged hawk, Archibuteo ferrugineus, the largest and handsomest bird of its genus, found in California and most other parts of western North America from British America southward: so called because it preys extensively upon ground-squirrels and related rodents. It is 23 inches long and 55 in extent; when adult the under parts are nearly white.

Squirrel-hawk (Archibuteo ferrugineus).

with rich chestnut flags barred with black; the tail is mostly white, clouded with silver-gray, and tinged with bay; and the dark upper parts are much varied with brownish red.

squirrel-lemur (skwūr'el-lē'mēr), n. A lemur of the subfamily Galagininae, and especially of the genus Galago. See cut under Galago.

squirrel-lock (skwūr'el-lok), n. Squirrel-fur from the under sides of the body. In gray squirrels it is pale-yellow, and it is used for lining winter garments.

squirrel-monkey (skwūr'el-mung'ki), n. One of many kinds of small South American monkeys with a long, bushy, and non-prehensile tail: so called from their general aspect. (a) Any member of the family Haplorhinae or Mididae; a marmoset. See cut under Haplorhinae. (b) Especially, n. salmi or titi of the genus Chrysotrux, as the death's-head, C. scirrus. See salmi, and compare saguin.

Squirrel-monkey (Chrysotrux scirrus).

squirrel-mouse (skwūr'el-mous), n. Same as dormouse.

squirrel-petaurist (skwūr'el-pe-tā'rist), n. A squirrel-phalanger.

squirrel-phalanger (skwūr'el-fā-lan'jēr), n. An Australian flying-phalanger, or petaurist, as Petaurus (Belideus) scireus, a marsupial mammal resembling a squirrel in some respects.

squirrel-shrew (skwūr'el-shrū), n. A small insectivorous mammal of the family Tupauidae, as a banxing or a pentail. See cuts under Tupaia and Ptilocercus.

squirreltail (skwūr'el-tāl), n. One of several grasses of the genus Hordeum. (a) In Great Britain, H. maritimum, and sometimes H. murinum, the wall-barley, and H. secalinum (H. pratense), the meadow-barley. (b) In the United States, chiefly H. jubatum, but in California also H. murinum, there naturalized and, as elsewhere, a pest, infesting wool, also the throats, etc., of animals, with its long barbed awns.

squirt (skwért), v. [E. dial. also swirt; perhaps < LG. swirtjen, squirt. The equiv. verb squitter can hardly be connected.] I. trans. 1. To eject with suddenness and force in a jet or rapid stream from a narrow orifice: as, to squirt water in one's face.

The hard-featured miscreant . . . coolly rolled his tobacco in his cheek and squirted the juice into the fire-grate. Scott, Guy Monnering, xxxiii.

2. To spatter or bespatter.

They know I dare
To spurn or buffet them, or squirt their eyes
With ink. B. Jonson, Apol. to Poetaster.

II. intrans. 1. To issue suddenly in a thin jet or jet-like stream, as from a syringe, or a narrow orifice suddenly opened; spurt.

The oors seemed to lash the water savagely, like a connected row of swords, and the spray squirted at each vicious stroke. C. Reade, Hard Cash, i.

2†. To prate; blab. [Old slang.]—Squirting cucumber. See Ecballium.

squirt (skwért), n. [< squirt, v.] 1. An instrument with which a liquid may be ejected in a strong jet-like stream; a syringe.

His weapons are a pin to scratch and a squirt to bespatter. Pope.

2. A small jet: as, a squirt of water.—3. A system of motion of a fluid, where the motion is everywhere irrotational, and where there is no expansion except at isolated points.—4. Looseness of the bowels; diarrhea. [Low.]—5. A small, insignificant, but self-assertive fellow; an upstart; a cad. [Colloq.]—6. A hasty start or spurt. [Colloq.]

How different from the rash jerks and hare-brain'd squirts thou art wont, Tristram, to transact it with in other humours—dropping thy pen, spurling thy ink about thy table and thy books. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, iii. 23.

7. A sea-squirt; an ascidian or tunicary. squirter (skwér'tér), n. [< squirt + -er.] One who or that which squirts. O. W. Holmes, Poet at the Breakfast-Table, v.

squirt-gun (skwért'gun), n. A kind of squirter or syringe used as a toy by boys.

squy (skwí'í), n. [< ME. squiere, < OF. esquire, esquerie, esquerie, escurie, escurie, < escurier, a squiro: see squire 1.] 1†. A number of squires or attendants collectively. Rob. of Brunne, Chronicles.—2. The whole body of landed gentry.

squit (skwit), n. Same as squeteague.

squitch (skwič), n. A variant of quitch 2.

squitee (skwi-tē'), n. Same as squeteague.

squob. See squab 1, squab 2.

squorget, n. [ME.; origin obscure.] A shoot.

The squorgets (tr. L. flagella for flagella) hie and graffes from the folde. Palladius, Husbandrie (O. E. T. S.), p. 65.

squuncket, n. An early spelling of skunk. W. Wood, 1634.

squynce, n. See quince.

sqw-. A Middle English fashion of writing squ.

Sr. A contraction of senior: as, John Smith, Sr.

Sr. In chem., the symbol for strontium.

sraddha, n. [Skt. śraddhā, < śrad + dha, faith.] A Hindu funeral ceremony in honor of a deceased ancestor, at which food is offered, and gifts are made to Brahmins.

ss. A Middle English form of sh.

ss-. A Middle English fashion of writing initial s.

SS. An abbreviation: (a) of saints; (b) [i. e.] of seillect (common in legal documents).

S. S. E. An abbreviation of south-southeast.

ssh. A common Middle English form of sch, now sh.

S. S. W. An abbreviation of south-southwest.

st. An abbreviation: (a) [cap.] of saint; (b) [cap. or l. c.] of street; (c) [cap. or l. c.] of strait; (d) of stanza; (e) of stet; (f) of statute.

st, interj. Same as hist 1.

-st†. See -est 1.

-st2. See -est 2.

stab (stab), v.; pret. and pp. stabbed, ppr. stabbing. [< ME. stappen (found in the noun); perhaps < Ir. Gael. stob, thrust, push, stab, fix a stake in the ground, < stob, a stake; pointed iron or stick, stub; cf. staff.] I. trans. 1. To puncture, pierce, or wound with or as with a pointed weapon, especially with a knife or dagger.

I fear I wrong the honorable men Whose daggers have stabbed Caesar. Shak., J. C., iii. 2. 157.

He was not to be torn in pieces by a mob, or stabbed in the back by an assassin. Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

2. To thrust or plunge, as a pointed weapon. [Rare.]

If we should recount
Our bold news, . . .
Stab poniards in our flesh till all were told.
The words would add more anguish than the wounds. Shak., 3 Hen. VI., ii. 1. 98.

3. Figuratively, to pierce or penetrate; inflict keen or severe pain upon; injure secretly, as by slander or malicious falsehoods: as, to stab one in the back (that is, to slander one behind his back).

Her silence stabbed his conscience through and through. Lowell, A Legend of Brittany, ii. 24.

4. In masonry, to pick (a brick wall) so as to make it rough, and thereby afford a hold for plaster.—To stab arms. See arm 1.—To stab out, to cut a continuous incision in with a sharp edge like that of a chisel, by making one cut in line with and in continuation of another, the first guiding the second, and so on.

II. intrans. 1. To aim a blow with a dagger or other pointed weapon, either literally or figuratively: as, to stab at a person.

None shall dare
With shortened sword to stab in closer war. Dryden, Pol. and Arc., iii. 509.

2. To wound; be extremely cutting.

She speaks poniards, and every word stabs. Shak., Much Ado, ii. 1. 255.

stab (stab), n. [< stab, v.] 1. A thrust or blow with the point of a weapon, especially a dagger.

Hee neuer reuengeth with lesse than the stab. Nashe, Pierce Penilesse, p. 25.

To fall beneath a base assassin's stab. Rowe, Ambitious Step-Mother, ii. 2.

2. A wound made with a sharp-pointed weapon.

His stab'd looks look'd like a breach in nature
For ruin's woful entrance. Shak., Macbeth, ii. 3. 119.

3. A wound given in the dark; a treacherous injury.

This sudden stab of rancour I misdoct. Shak., Rich. III., iii. 2. 89.

Stabat Mater (stā'bat mā'tér), [So called from the first words of the Latin text, Stabat mater, 'The mother (sc. of Jesus) was standing': L. stabat, 3d pers. sing. imperf. ind. of stare, stand (see stand); mater = Gr. μήτηρ = E. mother: see mother.] 1. In the Rom. Cath. liturgy, a sequence on the Virgin Mary at the crucifixion, written about 1300 by Jacobus de Benedictis (Jacobone da Todi). It has also been ascribed to Innocent III. and others, and was probably modeled on older hymns such as the staurolithotokia of the Greek Church. It is sung after the Epistle on the Feasts of the Seven Dolours of the Blessed Virgin Mary on the Friday before Good Friday and on the third Sunday in September.

2. A musical setting of this sequence. Famous examples have been written by Palestrina, Pergolesi, Rossini, Dvořák, and others.

stabber (stab'ér), n. [< stab + -er.] 1. One who stabs; one who murders by stabbing.

A lurking, waylaying coward, and a stabber in the dark. Dennis (?), True Character of Mr. Pope (1716).

2. A pricker. (a) Naut., a three-cornered awl used by sailmakers to make holes in canvases. (b) A leather-workers' pegging-awl. (c) An awl used in needlework to make holes for eyelets.

stabbing (stab'ing), n. [Verbal n. of stab, v.] In bookbinding, the making of perforations in the inner margins of pamphlets for the insertion of binding-thread or viro. Also called, in England, holing.

stabbingly (stab'ing-li), adv. In a stabbing manner; with intent to do an act of secret malice.

stabbing-machine (stab'ing-mā-shēn'), n. In bookbinding, a machine for perforating the inner margins of gathered pamphlets by means of stout steel needles operated by a treadle.

stabbing-press (stab'ing-pres), n. In bookbinding, same as stabbing-machine.

stably, adv. An old spelling of stably.

stabilify (stā-bil'i-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. stabilified, ppr. stabilifying. [< L. stabilis, steadfast, steady (see stable 2), + facere, make.] To render stable, fixed, or firm; establish. [Rare.]

Render solid and stabilify mankind. Browning, (Imp. Dict.) stabiliment† (stā-bil'i-ment), n. [< L. stabilimentum, a stay, support, < stabilire, make firm, fix: see stable 2, v.] 1. Stabilishment; establishment. [Rare.]

If the apostolate, in the first stabiliment, was this eminency of power, then it must be so. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), ii. 32.

2. Support; prop. [Rare.]

They serve for stabiliment, propagation, and shade. Derham.

stabilisation, stabilise. See stabilization, stabilize.

stabilitate (stā-bil'i-tāt), v. t. [< L. stabilitas, steadfastness, firmness (see stability), + -ate 2.] To make stable; establish.

The soul about it self circumgyrates
Her various forms, and what she most doth love
She oft before her self stabilitates. Dr. H. More, Psychathanastia, i. ii. 43.

Melittææ, Marrubiacæ, and Lamiææ; other important genera are Physoslegia, Brusella (Prunella), Phlomis, Sideritis, Boltonia, Galeopsis, Lamium, Leonurus, and Moluccella. See cut under self-heal.

Stachys (stāk'kīs), n. [NL. (Rivinus, 1690), < L. stachys, < Gr. στάχυς, a plant, woundwort, Stachys arvensis, so called from the spiked flowers; a particular use of στάχυς, an ear of corn, a spike, in gen. a plant.] A genus of plants, of the order Labiata, type of the tribe Stachydeæ. It is characterized by flowers with the five calyx-teeth equal or the posterior larger, the corolla-tube somewhat cylindrical and either included in or exerted from the calyx, the upper lip usually entire and arched, the anther-cells usually diverging, and the ovary forming nutlets which are obtuse or rounded at the top. Over 200 species have been described, of which about 170 are now thought to be distinct. They are widely dispersed through the temperate zones, occur within the tropics on mountains, and extend in a few cases into frigid and subarctic regions. They are lacking in Australia and New Zealand, and nearly so in Chili and in South Africa. Sixteen species occur in the United States; 5 are eastern, of which S. aspera is the most common, and S. palustris the most widely diffused. Several species, especially S. sylvatica of Europe, are known as hedge-nettle, and several others as woundwort, particularly S. Germanica. For S. Helonica see belony, and for S. palustris see clown-head. Several species are occasionally cultivated for ornament, as S. lanata, a woolly-leaved plant much used for edging; S. affinis (S. tuberosa), an excellent recently introduced from Japan, cultivated in France under the name of cranes, produces numerous small white tubers which may be eaten boiled or fried or prepared as a preserve. The tubers are said to decay rapidly if exposed to the air, and are kept in the ground or packed in sand; their taste is compared to that of the sweet potato, followed by a peculiar piquant flavor.

Stachytarpheta (stāk'-tār-fē'tā), n. [NL. (Vahl, 1804), so called from the thick flower-spikes; prob. an error for Stachytarpheta, < Gr. στάχυς, a spike, + ταρφή, thick, dense, < τρίβω, thicken.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Verbenaceæ and tribe Verboneæ. It is characterized by sessile spiked flowers with a narrow five-lobed five-angled calyx, a corolla with five spreading lobes, two perfect stamens with divergent anther-cells, and two two-lobed ovary ripening into two hard dry oblong or linear one-seeded nutlets. There are about 45 species, natives of tropical and subtropical America, with one species, S. Indica, also dispersed through tropical Africa and Asia. They are herbs or shrubs bearing opposite or alternate toothed and commonly rugose leaves. The flowers are white, blue, purple, or scarlet, solitary in the axils of bracts, and sessile or half-lanceolate in the axils of the more or less densely crowded terminal spikes. The species are sometimes called basilard or false vervain. S. Jamaicensis (now identified with S. Indica) is the gerao (which see), from its use sometimes called Brazilian tea. This and other species, as S. multibacca, a handsome ever-blooming shrub, are occasionally cultivated under glass.

stack (stāk), n. [< ME. stack, stacke, stakke, stak, stac, < Icel. stakkr, a stack of hay (cf. stakka, a stump), = Sw. stack = Dan. stak, a stack, pile of hay; allied to stakel, and ult. from the root of stid. Hence staggard.] 1. A pile of grain in the sheaf, or of hay, straw, pease, etc., gathered into a circular or rectangular form, often, when of large size, coming to a point or ridge at the top, and thatched to protect it from the weather.

The whole prairie was covered with yellow wheat stacks. Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 631.

2. A pile of sticks, billets, poles, or cordwood; formerly, also, a pyro, or burial pile.

Against every pillar was a stack of billets above a man's height, which the watermen that bring wood down the Seine . . . laid there. Jacobs, Not. Hist., § 240.

3. A pile or group of other objects in orderly position. (a) In printing, a flat pile of paper, printed or unprinted, in a press-room or bindery. (b) Milit., the pyramidal group formed by a number of muskets with fixed bayonets when stacked. (c) In paper-making, four or more calendering-rolls in position. (d) In libraries, a set of book-shelves one above the other, whether placed against a wall or standing in the middle of a room.

4. A number of funnels or chimneys standing together.—5. A single chimney or passage-way for smoke; the chimney or funnel of a locomotive or steam-vessel; also called smoke-stack. See cuts under passenger-engine and puddling-furnace.—6. A high detached rock; a columnar rock; a precipitous rock rising out of the sea. The use of the word stack with this meaning is very common on the coast of Scotland and the adjacent islands (especially the Orkneys), and is almost exclusively limited to that region.

Here [in Shetland] also, near 200 yards from the shore, stands the Stack of Snida, a grand perpendicular column of rock, at least sixty, but more probably eighty, feet high, on the summit of which the eagle has hitherto nested from time immemorial. Shirreff, Shetland, p. 6.

7. A customary unit of volume for fire-wood and coal, generally 4 cubic yards (108 cubic feet). The three-quarter stack in parts of Derbyshire is said to be 105 or 106 cubic feet.—8. pl. A large quantity; "lots": as, stacks of money. [Slang.] = Syn. 1. Shock, etc. See sheaf.

stack (stāk), v. t. [ME. stakken (= Sw. stacka = Dan. stakke), stack; from the noun.] 1. To pile or build in the form of a stack; make into a regularly formed pile: as, to stack grain.

Your hay is well brought in, and better stacked than usual. Swift, To Dr. Sheridan, Sept. 19, 1725.

2. To make up (cards) in a designed manner, so as to secure an unfair advantage; pack.—To stack arms, to stand together muskets or rifles with fixed bayonets in definite numbers, as four or six together, so that they form a tent-shaped group.

stack (stāk), n. An obsolete or dialectal pretense of stick (and stick).

stackage (stāk'āj), n. [< stack + -age.] 1. Grain, hay, etc., put up in stacks. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.—2. A tax on things stacked. Imp. Dict.

stack-borer (stāk'bōr'ēr), n. An instrument for piercing stacks of hay, to admit air, where the hay is in danger of damage from heating.

stacken-cloud (stāk'n-klood), n. A cumulus cloud.

The rapid formation and disappearance of small cumuli is a process constantly going on in particular kinds of weather. These little stacken-clouds seem to form out of the atmosphere, and to be resolved again as rapidly into it. Forster, Atmospheric Phenomena, p. 68.

stacker (stāk'ēr), v. i. [Se. also stalker, stacker; < ME. staloren, also staloten, < Icel. stakra, push, stagger, freq. of staka, push, punt; cf. staka, punt, push with a stako (staki, a punt-pole), = Dan. stage = Sw. staka, push, punt with a stake, = MD. stakren, stacken, set stakes, dam up with stakes, give up work, = E. stake: see stake, v. Doublet of stagger.] 1. To stagger. [Prov. Eng.]

She rist her up, and stackereth heer and ther. Chaucer, Good Women, l. 2687.

2. To stammer. Prompt. Parv., p. 471.

stacker (stāk'ēr), n. [< stack + -er.] An attachment to a threshing-machine for raising and delivering the straw from the machine, either upon a wagon or upon a stack. It consists of an endless-belt elevator running in a trough that can be placed at any angle, the whole being mounted on wheels, and connected by beltting with the thrasher, or with the engine or other motor. Also called straw-hay-elevator, straw, stacking-machine. Another form of stacker consists of a portable derrick used with a hay-fork, and commonly called a stacking-derrick.

stacket (stāk'et), n. [< G. stacket, a pulisade, stockade; appar. connected with stack.] A stockade. Scott.

stack-funnel (stāk'fun'el), n. A pyramidal open frame of wood in the center of a stack. Its object is to allow the air to circulate through the stack, and prevent the heating of the grain. See stack-stand.

stack-guard (stāk'gürd), n. A covering for a haystack or rick, whether for the top or the exposed side. Sometimes it is suspended from posts temporarily set up.

Stackhousia (stāk-hou'si-ā), n. [NL. (Sir J. E. Smith, 1793), named after John Stackhouse, an English botanist (died 1819).] A genus of plants, type of the order Stackhousiaceæ. It consists of about 20 species, all Australian except 2, which are natives, one of New Zealand, the other of the Philippine Islands. They are small herbs with a perennial herbaceous or woody rootstock, producing unbranched or slightly divided flower-bearing stems and alternate linear or spatulate leaves, which are entire and slightly fleshy or coriaceous. The flowers are white or yellow, borne in spikes terminating the branches, or in clusters along the main stem. Each flower consists of a small three-bracted calyx, an elongated often gamopetalous corolla with five included stamens, a thin disk, and a free ovary with from two to five styles or style-branches.

Stackhousia (stāk-hou'si-ā), n. pl. [NL. (H. G. L. Reichenbach, 1823), < Stackhousia + -æ.] An order of plants, of the polypetalous series Discifloræ and cohort Celastrales. It is characterized by a hemispherical calyx-tube, having five imbricated lobes, five erect imbricated and often united petals, and as many alternate stamens. From the related orders Celastrineæ and Rhamnaeeæ it is especially distinguished by its lobed ovary, which is sessile, roundish, and from two- to five-celled, and ripens from two to five indurated globose or angled one-seeded carpels, which are smooth, reticulated, or broadly winged. It consists of the genus Stackhousia and the monotypic Australian genus Meyregoria. Also Stackhousiaceæ.

stacking-band (stāk'ing-band), n. A band or rope used in binding thatch or straw on a stack.

stacking-belt (stāk'ing-belt), n. Same as stacking-band.

stacking-stage (stāk'ing-stāj), n. A scaffold or stage used in building stacks.

stack-room (stāk'rūm), n. In libraries, a room devoted to stacks of book-shelves; a book-room.

stack-stand (stāk'stand), n. A basement of timber or masonry, sometimes of iron, raised on props and placed in a stack-yard, on which to build a stack. Its object is to keep the lower part of the stack dry, and exclude vermin. Such stands are more common in European countries than in the United States.

stack-yard (stāk'yārd), n. [< stack + yard.] Cf. staggard.] A yard or inclosure for stacks of hay or grain.

stacte (stāk'tē), n. [< L. stacte, stacta, < Gr. στακτή, the oil that trickles from fresh myrrh or cinnamon, fem.

of στακρός, dropping, oozing out, < στάζειν, drop, let fall drop by drop.] One of the sweet spices which composed the holy incense of the ancient Jews. Two kinds have been described—one, the fresh gum of the myrrh-tree, Dalsamodendron Myrrha, mixed with water and squeezed out through a press; the other, the resin of the storax, Styrax officinale, mixed with wax and fat.

Tako unto theo sweet spices, stacte, and onycha, and galbaun. Ex. xxx. 34.

stactometer (stāk-tom'ē-tēr), n. [Also stactometer; < Gr. στακρός, dropping, oozing out (see stacte), + μέτρον, a measure.] A glass tube having a bulb in the middle, and tapering to a fine orifice at one end, used for ascertaining the number of drops in equal bulks of different liquids. Also called stalagmometer.

stad, A Middle English form of the past participle of stead.

stadda (stad'ā), n. [Origin obscure.] A double-bladed hand-saw, used for cutting comb-teeth. Also called staddy.

staddle (stad'el), n. [Also staddle, and more orig. stallid, Sc. stailid, contr. stail, stale, < ME. stallid, < AS. stathol, stathul, stathol, a foundation, base, seat, site, position, firmament (= OS. stadal = OFries. stathul = MLG. stadel = OHG. stadal, MHG. G. stadel, a stall, shed, = Icel. stöð-hull = Norw. stöðul, stodul, contr. stöul, staul, stöl, stul, usually stöl, a milking-shed); with formative -hol (-ile) (akin to L. stabilum, a stable, stall, with formative -bulum), from the root sta of stand; see stand, and cf. stead. See stalworth.] 1. A prop or support; a staff; a crutch.

His weak steps governing And aged limbs on cypress staddle stout. Spenser, F. Q., I. vi. 14.

2. The frame or support of a stack of hay or grain; a stack-stand.

Oak looked under the staddles and found a fork. T. Hardy, Far from the Maddling Crowd, xxxvi.

3. A young or small tree left uncut when others are cut down.

It is common to see that those young staddles which we leave standing at one or twenty years fall are usually at the next sale cut down without any danger of the statute, and serve for fire-bote, if it pleases the owner to burn them.

W. Harrison, Descrip. of England, II. 22. (Holinshed.) At the edge of the woods a rude structure had been hastily thrown up, of staddles interlocked with boughs. S. Judd, Margaret, II. 5.

4. In agri., one of the separate plots into which a cock of hay is shaken out for the purpose of drying.

staddle (stad'el), v. t.; pret. and pp. staddled, ppr. stadding. [Also stadio; < staddle, n.] 1. To leave the staddles in, as a weed when it is cut.

First see it well fenced, ere hewers begin, Then see it well staddled, without and within. Tusser, April's Husbandry.

2. To form into staddles, as hay.

staddle-roof (stad'el-rōf), n. The roof or covering of a stack.

stade (stād), n. Same as stathic.

stade (stād), n. [In ME. stadic, q. v.; = F. stado = Sp. estadio = Pg. estadio = It. stadio, < L. stadium, a furlong; see stadium.] A furlong; a stadium.

The greatness of the town, by that we could judge, stretcheth in circuit some forty stades. Donne, Hist. Septuagint (1633), p. 71. (Latham.)

stadholder (stad'hōl'dēr), n. [Also spelled stadtholder (= F. stadhouder); a partial accommodation of MD. stadholder, a deputy, legate, vicar, substitute, lieutenant, esp. a viceroy, a governor of a province, esp. in Holland, in later use (D. stadhouder = G. statthalter), a governor, a chief magistrate, lit. 'stead-holder, lieutenant, "locum-tenens" (Kilian); < MD. stad, stede, D. stede, stec (= OHG. MHG. stat, G. statt, place, = AS. stede, E. stead, place), + holder = G. halter = E. holder: see stead and holder. In another view, reflected in the false spelling stadholder, the first element is supposed to be D. stad = G. stadt, a town, city (a particular use of the preceding); but this is an error, due to the fact that D. stad, in its lit. sense 'place', is now obsolete; moreover, a stadholder is not the 'keeper of a city.' Formerly, in the Netherlands, (a) the governor or lieutenant-governor of a province; (b) the chief magistrate of the United Provinces of the Netherlands.

Stack-stand with Stack-funnel.

stadholderate (stad' hōl' dēr-āt), n. [Also spelled stadtholderate (= F. stathandérat); < stadholder + -ate.] The office of a stadholder. The Academy, July 20, 1889, p. 32.

stadholdership (stad' hōl' dēr-ship), n. [Also spelled stadtholdership; < stadholder + -ship.] Same as stadholderate.

stadia (stā'di-ā), n. [ML. stadia, n. station, a fem. form, orig. pl. of the neut. stadium, a stage, station, stadium: see stadium.] 1. A station temporarily occupied in surveying. 2. An instrument for measuring distances by means of the angle subtended by an object of known dimensions. The instrument commonly so called, intended for rough military work in action, consists of a small glass plate with figures of horsemen and foot-soldiers as they appear at marked distances, or with two lines nearly horizontal but converging, crossed by vertical lines marked with the distances at which a man appears of the height between the first lines.

3. In civil and topographical engin., the method or the instruments by which what are called stadia measurements are made. This use is almost exclusively limited to the United States, where this method of measuring distances is extensively employed. Stadia measurements are based on the geometrical principle that the lengths of parallel lines subtending an angle are proportioned to their distances from the apex of that angle. The essential appliances for this kind of work are a pair of two horizontal wires (which are usually of platinum, but which may be spider-webs, or even lines ruled or photographed on the glass), in addition to the ordinary horizontal and vertical wires in the diaphragm of a telescope, and a staff or graduated rod (the stadia rod)—these giving the means of measuring with considerable precision the angle subtended by the whole or any part of a vertical staff, and thus furnishing the data for determining the distance of the rod from the point of sight. This may be accomplished by making the subtending angle variable (that is, by making the wires movable) and the space on the staff fixed in length, or by having the angle constant (that is, the wires fixed in position) and reading off a varying length on the staff; the latter is the method now most generally used. The wires may be applied to the telescope of any suitable instrument, as a theodolite or transit-theodolite; but the method is especially well adapted for use in plane-tableing, the wires being inserted in the telescope of the alidade. This arrangement has been extensively used in the United States, and has given excellent results. The intervals between the wires are frequently arranged so that at a distance of 100 feet a space of one foot shall be intercepted on the rod; but there are also instruments made in which the number of wires is increased, the method of reading varying accordingly.

Yf a man remeth in the stadie or in the forlunge for the corone, than fletth the mede in the corone for whiche he remeth. Chaucer, Boethius, iv. prose 3.

stadimeter (stā'di-on' ē-tēr), n. [Gr. stādion (see stadium) + μέτρον, measure.] A modified theodolite in which the directions are not read off, but marked upon a small sheet, which is changed at each station. The distances as read on the telemeter can also be laid down. The stadimeter differs from the plane-table in that the alidade cannot be moved relatively to the sheet.

stadium (stā'di-nm), n. pl. stadia (-i). [L. stadium, < Gr. stādion, a fixed standard of length, specifically 600 Greek feet (see def. 1), a furlong (nearly), hence a race-course of this length, lit. 'that which stands fast,' < στάειν (√ στα), stand: see stand. Cf. stadē, stadie.] 1. A Greek itinerary unit, originally the distance between successive stations of the shouters and runners employed to estimate distances. The stadium of Eratosthenes seems to have been short of 620 English feet; but the stadium at the race-course at Athens has been found to be between 603 and 610 English feet. The Roman stadium was about the same length, being one eighth of a Roman mile.

Hence—2. A Greek course for foot-races, disposed on a level, with sloping banks or tiers of seats for spectators rising along its two sides and at one end, which was typically of semi-circular plan. The course proper was exactly a stadium in length. The most celebrated stadia were those of Olympia and Athens. The latter has been, in great part, restored.

3. A stage; period; in med., a stage or period of a disease, especially of an intermittent disease.

Mohammed was now free once more; but he no longer thought of carrying on his polemic against the Meccans or of seeking to influence them at all. In his relations to them three stadia can be distinguished, although it is easier to determine their character than their chronology. Encyc. Brit., xvi. 550.

stadlet, n. An obsolete form of staddle.

Stadmannia (stad-man'i-ā), n. [NL. (Lamarek, 1823), named after Stadmann, a German botanical traveler.] A genus of trees, of the order Sapindaceae and tribe Nephelieae. It is distinguished from the nearly related genus Nephelium (which see) by the absence of petals and by a somewhat spherical calyx with five broad obtuse teeth, by warty branches, and by small velvety plum-like berries. The only species, S. Sideroxylon, is a native of Mauritius and Bourbon. It has alternate abruptly pinnate leaves with from three to six pairs of oblong obtuse leaflets, oblique at the base, each leaflet narrow, entire, smooth, and finely reticulate. The small pedicelled flowers form axillary branching panicles, with conspicuous long-exserted erect stamens. It is known as Bourbon ironwood. See Macassar oil, under oil.

stadtholder, stadtholderate (stat' hōl' dēr, -āt), etc. Erroneous spellings of stadholder, etc.

staff (stāf), n.; pl. staves, staffs (stāivz, stāfs). [ME. staff, staffe, staf (gon. staves, dat. stave, pl. staves); < AS. staf, in a very early form stach, pl. stafas, a stick, staff, twig, lotter (see etym. of book); = OS. staf = OFries. stef = D. staf = MLG. LG. staf = OHG. MHG. stap (stab), G. stab, a staff, = Isl. staf, a staff, post, stick, stave of a cask, a letter, = Sw. staf, a staff, = Dan. stav, a staff, stick (also stab, a staff (body of assistants), an astragal (of a cannon), < G.), = Goth. stafs (stab), element, rudiment (not recorded in the orig. senses 'letter' and 'stick'); = OBulg. stapiŭ, shtapiŭ = OServ. slipiŭ, Serv. stap, shtap = Hung. istáp, a staff, = Lith. stebas, a staff, stābas, stōbras, a pillar; cf. Gael. stob, a stake, stump; prob. related to OHG. stabēn, be stiff, from an extended form of the root stā of stand: see stand. Not connected with L. stipes, a stock, post, which is cognate with E. stiff. Hence stare, q. v.] 1. A stick or pole. Specifically—(a) A stick used as a walking-stick, especially one five or six feet long used as a support in walking or climbing.

In his hand a staff. Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 495. He [the pilgrim] had a long staff in his hand with a noth in the middle, according to the fashion of those Pilgrims staves. Coryat, Cruicillies, l. 20.

(b) A stick used as a weapon, as that used in quarter-staff; a club; a cudgel.

A god to handle staffe therowt he hent, Before Iken he lpe. Robin Hood and the Potter (Child's Ballads, V. 20).

The wms are doubtful; And on our horsemen's staves Death looks as grimly As on your keen-edg'd swords. Fletcher, Humorous Lieutenant, l. 1.

(c) A stick used as an ensign of authority; a baton or scepter. Compare baton, club, mace.

The Earl of Worcester Hath broke his staff, resign'd his stewardship. Shak., Rich. II., li. 2. 59.

(d) A post fixed in the ground; a stake.

The rampant bear chain'd to the ragged staff. Shak., 2 Hen. VI., v. 1. 203.

(e) A pole on which to hoist and display a flag; as, a flag-staff; an ensign-staff; a jack-staff.

The flag of Norway and the cross of St. George floated from separate staves on the lawn. B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 235.

(f) The pole of a vehicle; a carriage-pole.

His newe lady holdeth him so narrow Up by the byrdel, at the staves end, That every word he deed it as an arrowe. Chaucer, Anelida and Arleite, l. 184.

(g) The long handle of certain weapons, as a spear, a halberd, or a poleax.

There stuck no plume in any English crest That is removed by a staff of France. Shak., K. John, li. 318.

Their staves upon their rests they lay. Dryden, Nymphidia.

(h) A straight-edge for testing or ruling a line or surface; as, the proof-staff used in testing the face of the stone in a grind-mill. (i) In surv., a graduated stick, used in leveling. See cross-staff, Jacob's-staff, and end under leveling-staff. (j) One of several instruments formerly used in taking the sun's altitude at sea: as, the fore-staff, back-staff, cross-staff. See these words. (k) In ship-building, a measuring and spacing rule. (l) The stilt of a plow.

2. In surg., a grooved steel instrument having a curvature, used to guide the knife or gorgot through the urethra into the bladder in the operation of lithotomy.—3. In arch., same as rudenture.—4. Something which upholds or supports; a support; a prop.

He is a staff of steadfastness both cry & tattoo To chaste stich knightliss as don nyest the lwa. Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 3.

The boy was the very staff of my age, my very prop. Shak., M. of V., li. 2. 70.

Bread is the staff of life. Swift, Tale of a Tub, iv.

5. A round of a ladder. Latham.—6. A body of assistants or executive officers. (a) Milit., a body of officers who are not in command of troops, but who act as the assistants of an officer in high command, sometimes including that officer himself. Thus, the regimental staff consists of the colonel, lieutenant-colonel, major, and adjutant, or the officers corresponding to these ranks; the brigade staff and division staff are composed of aides-de-camp, commissaries, quartermasters, and the like; and the staff of a general commanding an army-corps, or an army composed of several army-corps, includes these last-named officers and also a chief of staff, a chief of artillery, a chief engineer, and the like. The general staff is a body of officers forming the central office of the army of a nation, and it acts, in sense, as the personal staff of the commander-in-chief, or of the king or other chief ruler. In the United States navy, staff-officers are the non-combatants, comprising the medical corps, the pay-corps, the steam-engineering corps, and chaplains, of those who go to sea, as well as civil engineers, naval constructors, and professors of mathematics. (b) A body of executive officers attached to any establishment for the carrying out of its designs, or a number of persons, considered as one body, intrusted with the execution of any undertaking; as, the editorial and reporting staff of a newspaper; the staff of the Geological Survey; a hospital staff.

The Archbishop [Becket] had amongst his chaplains a staff of professors on a small scale. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 143.

7. A letter of the alphabet. See etymology of book.

The first staff iss nemmed I. Ormulum, l. 4312.

8. A line; a verso; also, a stanza.

Nerchande stafe by staf, by gret diligence, Saying that I most inete apply to; The woundes meue, and seth here & ther. Rom. of Parthenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 6555.

If we consider well the form of this Poetical staf, we shall finde it to be a certain number of verses allowed to go altogether and loyne without any intermission, and doo or should finish vp all the sentences of the same with a full period. Pattenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 54.

I can sing but one staff of the ditty neither. B. Jonson, Poetaster, li. 1.

Cowley found out that no kind of staff is proper for a heroic poem, as being all too lyrical. Dryden.

9. In musical notation, a set of five horizontal lines on which notes are placed so as to indicate the pitch of intended tones. Both the lines and the spaces between them are significant, and are called degrees: they are numbered from below upward. When the five degrees of the staff are not sufficient for the notation of a melody or chord, it is extended by means of add. or ledger lines above or below. In general, the successive degrees of the staff are understood to correspond to the successive degrees of the scale or to the successive white keys of the keyboard, irrespective of the fact that the intervals thus indicated are not equal to each other. An absolute pitch for the staff-degrees is indicated by a clef placed at the beginning. (See clef.) Gregorian music is customarily written on a staff of four lines, and the only clef used is the C clef. The staff with its appropriate notation is a development from the early medieval neumes, which were originally dots, dashes, or compound marks, whose relative position or shape indicated the relative pitch of successive tones. To make this notation more precise a horizontal line was drawn across the page to mark the pitch of some given tone, as C or F, and the neumes were arranged above or below this line. Later, a second line was added, and then others, only the lines being at first regarded as significant. What was called the great or grand staff was such a staff of eleven lines. In harmonic or concerted music, two or more staves are used together, and are connected by a brace. See bracket, 5, and score, 9. Also stave, especially in Great Britain.

10. In her., same as fissure, 5.—Bishop's staff. See crozier, 1.—Cantoral staff, cantor's staff, the official staff of a cantor or precentor; it is primarily the baton with which he beats time, but is often large, and elaborately ornamented, becoming a mere badge of office. Also called baton.—David's staff, a kind of quadrat formerly used in navigation.—Episcopal staff, in her., the representation of a bishop's or pastoral staff, usually entwined with a bannerole which is secured to the shaft below the head. See cut under bannerole.—Follikerous staff. See follikerous.—Jeddart staff, a form of battle-axe used by mounted men-at-arms: so named from the town of Jeddburgh, in Scotland, the arms of which bear such a weapon. Also called Jeddburgh.—Northern staff.—Palmer's staff, in her., same as bannerole, 5.—Papal staff, in her., a staff topped with the papal cross of three cross-bars.—Pastoral staff, a staff borne as an emblem of episcopal authority by or before bishops, archbishops, abbots, and abbesses. In the Western Church it is usually headed with a volute, suggesting a shepherd's crook, and in the Greek Church it generally has a T-shaped head, often curved upward and inward at the ends; in the Roman Catholic and some other churches it bears a cross in the case of an archbishop, and a double cross in the case of a patriarch. See cambium, crozier, pateresca, sudarium.—Pilgrim's staff. See pilgrim.—Red staff, in milling, a straight-edge used to test the dress of a millstone. It is so called because it is rubbed with red chalk or ochre, by means of which inequalities on the surface of the stone are detected.—Ring-and-staff investiture. See ecclesiastical investiture, under investiture.—Short staff, the cudgel used in ordinary end-game, similar to the modern single-stick as distinguished from quarter-staff.—Staff raguly, in her., either a palleted couped raguly, or the representation of a trunk of a tree with short projections on the opposite sides, as of limbs sawed off.—

To argue from the staff to the corner, to raise some other question than that under discussion. Abp. Bramhall, Works, II, 94. (Davies.)—To break a staff. Same as to break a lance (which see, under break).—To go to sticks and staves. See stick.—To have the better or worse end of the staff, to be getting the best or worst of a matter.

And so now ours seem to have the better end of the staff. Court and Times of Charles I., II, 94.

To set down (or up) one's staff, to stop and rest, as a traveler at an inn; abide for a time. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I, 185. (Davies.) See crook, crozier, crutch.

staff<sup>2</sup> (stáf), n. Plaster of Paris mixed, in water, with some cement, glycerin, and dextrine: used as a building material. It was first employed at the Paris Exposition of 1878, and was extensively used in the construction of the buildings of the Chicago Exposition in 1893.

staff-angle (stáf'ang'gl), n. In plastering, a square rod of wood, standing flush with the wall on each of its sides, at the external angles of plastering, to protect them from injury.

staff-bead (stáf'béd), n. In arch., an angle-bead.

staff-captain (stáf'kap'tán), n. The senior grade in the navigating branch of the British navy.

staff-commander (stáf'kq-mán'dér), n. The second grade in the navigating branch of the British navy. See master, I (b).

staff-degree (stáf'dé-gré), n. In musical notation, a degree of a staff, whether line or space.

staff-duty (stáf'dú'ti), n. The occupation or employment of an officer who serves on a staff, especially of one who, not originally a staff-officer, has been detached from his regiment, and attached to a staff.

staffed (stáf't), a. [< staff + -ed.] 1. In her., surrounded or combined with staffs: as, an annulet staffed, a ring from which staffs or scepters radiate.—2. Provided with a staff or body of officers; officered. [Recent.]

A powerful church of the new type, staffed by friends and pupils of Eusey, rose in the centre of it. Mrs. Humphry Ward, Robert Elsmere, xxxiii.

staffelite (stáf'e-lit), n. [< Staffel (see def.) + -ite.] A somewhat altered apertite, occurring in botryoidal reniform shapes of a green color, incrusting the phosphorite found at Staffel, near the Lahn, in Prussia.

staff-herding (stáf'hér'ding), n. In old Eng. forest law, the grazing of cattle in charge of a herdsman. This was restrained or forbidden as more injurious to the herds of deer than if there were no herdsman to drive away the deer, and the cattle had to find their own feeding-ground.

staff-hole (stáf'hól), n. In metal, a small hole in a puddling-furnace through which the puddler heats his staff. Weale.

staffier (stáf'iér), n. [= D. staffier, an attendant, < OF. estaffier, a lackey, footboy that runs by the stirrup, etc., < It. staffiere, staffiero, a lackey, footboy, < staffia, a stirrup (ML. staffia) (> dim. staffetta, a little stirrup, a courier, > Sp. Pg. estafeta = F. estafette, > D. estafette = G. staffette = Sv. stafett = Dan. stafet, a courier), < OHG. stapfo, stapfo, MHG. G. stapfe, a footstep (also a stirrup?), < OHG. MHG. stapfen, also OHG. stapfôn, MHG. stapfen, step, tread, = E. step: see step, and cf. OBulg. stopa, a spur. The notion reflected on the def. as given in most dictionaries, that staffier means a 'staff-bearer,' and is connected with staff, is erroneous.] A footman; an attendant.

Before the dame, and round about,
March'd whiffers and staffiers on foot,
With lackies, grooms, valets, and pages,
In fit and proper equipages.

S. Butler, Hudibras, II, li. 650.

staffish (stáf'ish), a. [In Sc. corruptly staffage; < staff + -ish.] Like a staff; rigid; hence, intractable. Ascham, Toxophilus (ed. 1864), p. 111.

staff-man (stáf'mán), n. A workman employed in silk-throwing.

staff-notation (stáf'nô-tá'shôn), n. In musical notation, the entire system of signs used in connection with the staff: opposed, for example, to the tonic sol-fa notation, in which no staff is used.

staff-officer (stáf'ôf'i-sér), n. An officer forming part of the staff of a regiment, brigade, army, or the like; in the United States navy, an officer not exercising military command.

staff-sergeant (stáf'sér'jént), n. A non-commissioned officer having no position in the ranks of a company, but attached to the staff of a regiment. In the United States service the staff-sergeants are the sergeant-major, ordnance-sergeant, hospital-steward, quartermaster-sergeant, and commissary-sergeant.

staff-sling (stáf'sling), n. [ME. staffeslynge, staffslinge; < staff + sling.] A weapon consisting of a sling combined with a short staff.

The staff was held with both hands and whirled around. The weapon seems to have thrown larger missiles than the ordinary sling and with greater force. Distinguished from cord-sling. Also called fustibale, fustibalus. This gaunt at him stones easte Out of a fel staf-slinge. Chaucer, Sir Thopas, I, 118.

staff-stone (stáf'stôn), n. Same as baculite.

staff-striker (stáf'stri-kér), n. A sturdy beggar; a tramp.

Many became staff-strikers, ... and wandered in parties of two, three, and four from village to village. R. Eden, quoted in Ribton-Turner's Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 63.

staff-surgeon (stáf'sér'jôn), n. A senior grade of surgeons in the British navy.

staff-tree (stáf'trē), n. A vine or tree of the genus Celastrus. The best-known species is the American C. scandens, a twiner with ornamental fruit, otherwise named climbing bittersweet, waxwork, staff-vine, and feverfew (see the last, and cut under bittersweet). The seeds of the East Indian C. paniculata have long been in repute among Hindu physicians for their stimulating and acid properties, and are applied externally or internally for the relief of rheumatism, etc. They yield an expressed oil, also an empyreumatic, known as oleum nigrum.

staff-vine (stáf'vín), n. See staff-tree.

stag (stag), n. [E. dial. also steg, Sc. also stag; early mod. E. stagg, staggie; < ME. steg, stagge, < Icel. steggr, steggi, a male animal (a male fox, cat, a gander, drake, etc.), lit. 'mounter,' < stiga = AS. stigan, mount: see styl. Hence staggard, staggon.] 1. The male of various animals, especially of the deer tribe. Specifically—(a) The male red-deer or a deer of other large species of the genus Cervus in a restricted sense; a hart, of which the female is a hind; and particularly the adult hart, at least five years old, with antlers fully developed (compare staggyrd, and see cuts under antler); in heraldry, a horned deer with branched antlers. The stag of Europe is Cervus elaphus, now found wild in Great Britain only in the Highlands of Scotland. It is a magnificent animal, standing 4 feet high at the shoulder, with the antlers 3 feet long, having sometimes ten points and palmed at the crown: sometimes known as a stag of ten. The hind is hornless and smaller. The corresponding animal in North America is the wapiti, there called elk (Cervus canadensis), larger than the European stag, with much-branched antlers sometimes upward of 4 feet long, not palmed at the end. (See cut under wapiti.) There are several Asiatic stags, among them the rishie deer (see Rusai, sambar). (b) A bull castrated when half-grown or full-grown; a bull-stag; a bull-sagg. (c) A male fox; a dog-fox. (d) A young horse; a colt (sometimes a filly). (e) A gander. (f) A drake. (g) A pit or exhibition game-cock less than one year old; the cockerel of the game-fowl. (h) A turkey-cock. (i) The wren. [Loeb, Eng.] (j) A stag-beetle. [In most of these uses prov. Eng.]

2. In com. slang: (a) An outside irregular dealer in stocks, not a member of the exchange. (b) A person who applies for the allotment of shares in a joint-stock company, not because he wishes to hold the shares, but because he hopes to sell the allotment at a premium. If he fails in this he forfeits to pay the deposit, and the allotment is forfeited.—3. A romping girl; a hoydon. [Prov. Eng.]

4. The color of the stag; a red dirty-brown color.

Come, my Cub, doe not scorn mee because I go in Stag, in Buff; leer's velvet too; thou seest I am worth thus much in bare velvet. Dekker, Satiromastix, I, 220 (ed. Pearson).

Royal stag, a stag that has antlers terminating in twelve or more points.

stag (stag), v.; pret. and pp. staggd, ppr. staggng. [< stag, n.] 1. Intrans. In com. slang, to not as a stag on the stock exchange. See stag, n., 2.

II. trans. To follow warily, as a deer-stalker does a deer; dog; watch.

[Slang.]

So you've been staggng this gentleman and me, and listening, have you? H. Kingsley, Geoffrey Hamlyn, v. (Davies.)

stagarth, n. An obsolete spelling of staggard.

stag-beetle (stag'bétl), n. A lamellicorn coleopterous insect of the genus Lucanus or restricted family Lucanidae (which see), the males of which have branched mandibles resembling the antlers of a stag. L. cervus is the common stag-beetle of Eu-

Staff-sling, about the 10th century. (From Viollet-le-Duc's "Dictionnaire du Mobilier français.") rope, and L. daphnis is the stag-beetle of the United States. The former is one of the largest of British beetles, distinguished by the enormous size of the horny and toothed mandibles in the male, and by the rather long elbowed antennae, which end in a perfoliated club, and are composed of ten joints, the first being very long. It is common in some localities in the neighborhood of London, and is often 2 inches long, of a black color. Other species are numerous in various parts of the world. See also cut under Platycerus.

stag-bush (stag'bûsh), n. The black haw, Viburnum prunifolium.

stag-dance (stag'dáns), n. A dance performed by men only. [Colloq., U. S.] stage (stáj), n. [< ME. stage, < OF. estage, cs-tage, estauge, astage, etc., a story, floor, stage, a dwelling-house, F. étage, story, stage, floor, loft, = Fr. estage, a stage, = It. staggio, a stake, prop. banisters (ML. reflex stagium, estagium), < ML. "stadium, lit. 'a place of standing,' or (as in It. staggio) 'that which stands,' < L. stare, pp. status, stand: see state, stand. Cf. étager. In the sense of 'the distance between two points,' the word was prob. confused with OF. estage, < L. stadium, < Gr. στάδιον, a measure of distance: see stadium, stade<sup>2</sup>, stadié.] 1. A floor or story of a house.

The Erie ascended into this tour quickly,

As some as he might to liest stage came.

Rom. of Parthenay (E. E. T. S.), I, 4925.

Lit'l John stode at a window in the mornynge,

And lokid forth at a stage.

Robin Hood and the Monk (Child's Ballads, V, 8).

2. A house; building.

Ther buth seruants in the stage

That serueth the maidenes of parage.

King Horn (E. E. T. S.), p. 68.

3. In arch., the portion between a projection and the retreat next above it in a medieval buttress; also, one of the horizontal divisions of a window separated by transoms.—4. A floor or platform elevated above the ground or common surface, for the exhibition of a play or spectacle, for public speakers or performers, or for convenience of view, use, or access: as, a stage for a mountebank; a stage for speakers in public.

Give order that these bodies

High on a stage be placed to the view.

Shak., Hamlet, v. 2, 389.

Specifically—(a) A floor elevated for the convenience of performing mechanical work and the like; a scaffold; a staging; as, seamen use floating stages, and stages suspended by the side of a ship, for calking and repairing. (b) In printing, a low platform on which stacks of paper are piled. (c) A shelf or horizontal compartment, as one of the steps of a court-cupboard.

The number of stages in the buffet or sideboard indicates the rank of the owner.

S. K. Handbook, Corporation and Colicco Plate.

(d) The platform on which an object is placed to be viewed through a microscope. (e) A wooden structure on a beach to assist in landing; a landing-place at a quay or pier. It sometimes rises and falls with the tide, or is lowered or raised to suit the varying height of the water.

Getting y<sup>e</sup> starte of y<sup>e</sup> ships that came to the plantation, they took away their stage, & other necessary provisions that they had made for fishing at Cap Anne y<sup>e</sup> year before.

Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 196.

(f) A raised platform on which theatrical performances are exhibited; the flooring in a theater on which the actors perform. In modern theaters the stage includes not only the part which can be seen from the auditorium, but Floor-plan of Stage.

A, proscenium; B, C, D, first, second, and third prompt-entrances respectively; E, wings; a, center; b, prompt-side; c, o.p.-side; d, prompt-center; e, o.p.-center.

also the spaces on each side, behind the proscenium-arch, which are used for shifting the wings or side-scenes, and are themselves called the wings. The part extending back from the orchestra to the proscenium-arch is called the proscenium. That side of the stage which is on the extreme left of the spectator is called the prompt-side, because in theaters which have no prompt-box the prompters stand there. The corresponding position to the spectator's right is called the opposite-prompt-side (or, briefly, o.p.-side). Half-way between the center and the prompt-side is the prompt-center, the corresponding position to the right being called the opposite-prompt-center (or, briefly, o.-p.-center). The stage is thus divided laterally into five parts, called in order the prompt-side, the prompt-center, the center, the o.-p.-center, and the o.-p.-side, and these designations extend through the whole depth of the stage, as well as, up into the flies: thus the five ropes by which a drop-scene is raised or lowered are known as the prompt-side

Stag-beetle (Lucanus cervus), one half natural size.

Section of stage, across from prompt side. type, prompt-center-rope, center-rope, etc. As regards depth, the stage is divided into entrances varying in number according to the number of the wings or side-scenes. That between the proscenium and the first wing is called on one side the first prompt-entrance, and on the other the first o.-p.-entrance. From the first wing to the next is the second prompt-entrance or second o.-p.-entrance, and so on. Everything above the stage from the top of the proscenium-arch upward is called the flies, and includes the borders, border-lights, all needed ropes, pulleys, and cleats, the beams to which these are attached, and the fly-galleries, from the boxes of which the drop-scenes are worked. The ancient Greek theater in its original form, as developed in the fifth century B. C., had no raised stage, the actors appearing in the orchestra and the chorus.

All the world's a stage,
And all the men and women merely players.
Shak., As you like it, II. 7. 129.

Mirth. Pray you help us to come stools here.
Pro. Where, on the stage, ladies?
Mirth. Yes, on the stage; we are persons of quality, I assure you, and would not of fashion, and come to see and to be seen.
H. Jonson, Staple of News, Ind.

Hence—5. With the definite article, the theater; the drama as acted or exhibited, or the profession of representing dramatic compositions; as, to take to the stage; to regard the stage as a school of elocution.

There were also poets that wrote only for the stage, I suppose plays and histories, to create the people with matters of dispute.

Potterham, Arte of Log. Poetrie, p. 29.
Let where the stage, the poor degraded stage,
Holds its warped mirror to a gaping age.
Sprue me, Parolishy.

6. A place where anything is publicly exhibited; a field for action; the scene of any noted action or career; the spot where any remarkable affair occurs.

Derhom, Physico-Theology, III. 1. stalactiform (stā-lak'ti-fōrm), a. [stalactic (ite)
+ L. forma, form.] Having the form of a sta-lactite; like stalactite; stalactical.

stalactite (stā-lak'tit), n. [= F. stalactite, <
NL. stalactites, < Gr. σταλακτός, dropping, oozing out in drops: see stalactic.] 1. A deposit of carbonate of lime, usually resembling in form a huge icicle, which hangs from the roof of a cave or subterranean rock-opening, where it has been slowly formed by deposition from calcareous water trickling downward through cracks or openings in the rocks above. Water containing carbonic acid in solution, which it has gained in filtering through the overlying soil, has the power of dissolving carbonate of lime, which it deposits again upon evaporation: stalactites are hence common in regions of limestone rocks. They are sometimes white, and nearly transparent, showing the broad cleavage-surfaces of the calcite, as those of the cave near Matanzas in Cuba; but commonly they have a granular structure with concentric bands of pale-yellow to brown colors. In some caverns the stalactites are very numerous and large, and of great beauty in their endless variety of form, especially in connection with the stalagmites, the corresponding depositions accumulated beneath the stalactites upon the floor of the caverns. The caves of Adelsberg in Carinthia and of Luray in Virginia are among the most celebrated for the beauty of their stalactites.

The grotto is perfectly dry, and there are no petrifica-tions or stalactites in it.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. 1. 41.

2. A similar form of some other mineral species, such as are occasionally observed, for example, of chalcodony, limonite, etc., but only sparingly and on a small scale. — 3. A like form of lava sometimes observed in connection with volcanic outflows. Lava stalactites have been noted hanging from the roofs of lava caverns in the crater of Kilauea in Hawaii; and slender forms of a nearly uniform diameter of one fourth of an inch, and from a few inches to 20 or 30 inches in length, ornament the roofs of caverns in the lava stream which descended from Mauna Loa in the same island in 1831. Stalagmites of lava rise from the lava floor beneath.

stalactited (stā-lak'ti-ted), a. [stalactite +
-ed.] Covered with stalactites; also, formed in more or less reinblanco of stalac-tites. — Stalactited

'steadfast,' 'well-based,' 'firm-set,' etc., hence 'stout,' < stathol, stathel, foundation, base, seat, kito, position, E. staddle, Sc. also contracted stæle, stail (cf. AS. stælan, contracted from statholian, found, establish), + cyrthe, weorth, worth, good, excellent, worth: see staddle and worth.*] Cf. the equiv. stathol-fæst, steadfast, firm, stable (< stathol, foundation, + fæst, firm, fast), and stedefæst, E. stead- fast (the AS. weorth and fæst as the second element of adj. compounds being used rather as adj. formatives than as independent words). Such contraction is not common in AS., and the form stælcyrthe has generally been otherwise explained: (b) < stalu (in comp. stæl-), stealing, theft, + weorth, wurth, worth, worthy (see stale<sup>1</sup> and worth<sup>2</sup>), but the sense 'worthy of theft,' 'worth stealing,' hence 'worth taking for use' ("captu dignu," Gibson), cannot apply to men, and the sense 'good at stealing,' suggested by some, even if it were etymologically admissible, could not apply to ships. (c) In another view, lit. 'worthy of place,' i. e. fit for its place or use, serviceable, < AS. stæl, stæll, also sometimes, esp. in comp., stæl, a place, stall, + weorth, wurth, worth, worthy (see stall<sup>1</sup> and worth<sup>2</sup>). The full form stal- occurs in ME. stalworthely, a var. of stalworthly, and in the mod. surname Stalworth. In any view, the ME. forms stalworth, stalcourthe, stalcourthe, stalcourthe, with medial e, must be regarded as irregular. In fact the orig. meaning of the compound appears to have been lost, and the ME. variations must be due to simulation of one or other of the words above considered. Hence, by further variation, stalwarth, and now stalwart, which is no longer regarded as a compound.] 1. Stoadfast; firm-based.

That stalworth sted [Constantinople] so strong was founded.

sac or body of two cells placed side by side and filled with a powdery substance, the pollen. This pollen, when mature, is discharged from the anther through various openings or pores. Theoretically the stamen is the homologue of a leaf, in which the two cells of the anther represent the folded halves of the blade, while the connective represents the midrib and the filament the petiole of the leaf. The pollen represents the parenchyma of the leaf. The stamens of a flower are collectively called the androecium. When both stamens and pistils are present in the same flower it is said to be hermaphrodite or perfect; when only stamens are present the flower is said to be staminate or male. The number of stamens varies in different plants from one to one hundred or more, but is generally constant for the same species, and forms an important element in the system of classification. The classes in the Linnean sexual system were based upon the number and position of the stamens; and in the natural system they are still an important factor. In regard to their insertion, stamens may be hypogynous, epigynous, or perigynous, or the flower may be gynandrous (see these words). See also under anther, anthophore, diadelphous, epigynous, extrorse, introrse, and many plant names.—Barron stamen. Same as sterile stamen.—Included stamens. See include.—Stamina of reason, first truths.—Sterile stamen, in bot., an organ or body which belongs to the series of stamens, or androecium, but which does not produce pollen; an imperfect stamen, as that produced by certain plants of the family Scrophulariaceae; a staminodium.

= Syn. 1. Falter, Stammer, Stutter. He who stammers weakens or breaks more or less completely in utterance; the act is occasional, not habitual, and for reasons that are primarily moral, belong to the occasion, and may be various. He who stammers has great difficulty in uttering anything; the act may be occasional or habitual; the cause is confusion, shyness, timidity, or actual fear; the result is broken and inarticulate sounds that seem to stick in the mouth, and sometimes complete suppression of voice. He who stutters makes sounds that are not what he desires to make; the act is almost always habitual, especially in its worst forms; the cause is often excitement; the result is a quick repetition of some one sound that is futile in a word that the person desires to utter, as c-c-c-catch.—Stammering bladder, a bladder whose muscles act irregularly and spasmodically, causing painful urination. Paquet.

II. trans. To utter or pronounce with hesitation or imperfectly; especially, to utter with involuntary breaks or catches: frequently with out.

His pale lips faintly stammered out "No."

stamp (stap), n. [OHG. stampf, stampf, MHG. stampf, a stamping-instrument, a stamp (> F. estampe = It. stampa, a stamp); in dim. form, MLG. LG. stampel = OHG. stempfil, MHG. stempfel, G. (after LG.) stempel = Sw. stämpel = Dan. stempel, a stamp; from the verb.] 1. An instrument for erasing, bruising, or pounding; specifically, in metal, that part of the machinery of a stamp-mill which rises and falls, and which delivers the blow by which the ore is reduced to the necessary fineness for being further treated for the separation of the valuable portion; by extension, the mill itself. The stamp consists of head and stem, the latter having upon it the tappet by which, through the agency of the cam or wiper which projects from an axis turned by steam- or water-power, it is raised.

There are 340 stamps in operation at Butte, and the amount of ore treated every day amounts to 500 tons.
Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 596.

2. An instrument for making impressions on other bodies; an engraved block, die, or the like, by which a mark may be made or delivered by pressure; specifically, a plate upon which is cut the design for the sides or back of a book.

—3. A hand-tool for cutting blanks from paper, leather, etc., in various patterns, according to the shape of the cutting-edges. It operates by pressure or a direct blow, or is laid on the material and struck with a hammer. Hand-stamps are used for cancelling, bating, embossing, eyeletting, and similar work.

The rank is but the guinea's stamp. Burns, For a' that.
Specifically—(a) An official mark set upon a thing chargeable with duty or tax showing that the duty or tax is paid. (b) The impression of a public mark or seal required by the British government for revenue purposes to be made by its officers upon the paper or parchment on which deeds, legal instruments, bills of exchange, receipts, checks, insurance policies, etc., are written, the fee for the stamp or stamped paper varying with the nature of the instrument or the amount involved. (See stamp-duty.) For receipts, foreign bills of exchange, and agreements, adhesive stamps may be used, but in general the stamp must be embossed or impressed. (c) A small piece of paper having a certain figure or design impressed upon it, sold by the government to be attached to goods, papers, letters, documents, etc., subject to duty, or to some charge as for postage, in order to show that such duty or charge has been paid; as, postage-stamps; receipt-stamps; internal-revenue stamps.

6. pl. Stamp-duties: as, the receiver of stamps and taxes. See stamp-duty.—7. pl. Money: so called in allusion to the use of postage-stamps and small paper notes ("stampers") as money. [Slang, U. S.]—8. That which is marked; a thing stamped; a medal.

Hanging a golden stamp about their necks.

Shakspeare, Macbeth, iv. 3. 163.

9. A coin, especially one of small value.

Ric. Oh, cruel, merciless woman,
To talk of love, and know I have no money.
I'd. I will consume myself to the last stamp,
Before thou gett'st me.

Middleton (and others), The Widow, II. 1.

10. A picture cut in wood or metal, or made by impression; an engraving; a plate or cliché.

He that will not only read, but in manner see, the most of these exploits of the Hollanders, with other rarities of the index, may resort to Thierdrike and Israel de Bry, who have in lively stamps expressed these Nautigations.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, ii. 461.

When I was at Venice, they were putting out very curious stamps of the several edifices which are most famous for their beauty or magnificence.

Addison, Remarks on Italy (Works, ed. Bohn, I. 388).

11. Sanction; value derived from suffrage or attestation; authority.

The common people do not judge of vice or virtue by the morality or the immorality so much as by the stamp that is set upon it by men of figure.

Sir R. L'Estrange.

12. Distinguishing mark; imprint; sign; indication; evidence.

If ever there was a work which carried with it the stamp of originality in all its parts, it is that of John Bunyan's Southey, Linnay, p. 70.

13. Make; cast; form; character; sort; kind; brand.

Those he hath . . . predestinated to be of our stamp or character, which is the image of his own Son, in whom, for that cause, they are said to be chosen.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. App. 1.

He had wantonly involved himself in a number of small book-debts of this stamp. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, I. 12.

14. In leather-manuf., a machine for softening hides by pounding them in a vat. E. H. Knight.

—15. Same as nobbili.

In the production of "charcoal plates" (for duplicate making), the first rough forged slabs are cut into pieces termed stamps.

Encyc. Brit., XIII. 319.

16. pl. Legs. [Old slang.]—Atmospheric stamp. See atmospheric.—Ball stamp, a peculiar form of stamp (so named from the inventor) in use at the mines on Lake Superior. It is a direct-action stamp, the stem of the stamp being the continuation of the piston-rod of the steam-engine which is the motive power.—Leavitt stamp, an improved form of Ball stamp, used chiefly in the Lake Superior mines. One ton is capable of crushing 250 tons of ore in 24 hours. This stamp works like the Nasmyth hammer, the force of gravity being aided by steam-pressure.—Stamp Act, an act imposing or regulating the imposition of stamp-duties; in American colonial history, an act, also known as Greenleaf's Stamp Act, passed by the British Parliament in 1765, providing for the raising of revenue in the American colonies by the sale of stamps and stamped paper for commercial transactions, real-estate transfers, lawsuits, marriage licenses, inheritances, etc.: It also provided that the royal forces in America should be billeted on the people. The act was to go into effect November 1st, 1765, but it aroused intense opposition, led by the assemblies of Virginia, Massachusetts, and other colonies. A "Stamp Act Congress," with delegates from many of the colonies, met at New York in October, 1765, and a petition against this and other oppressive measures was sent to England. The Stamp Act was repealed in March, 1766, but the agitation was one of the leading causes in effecting the revolution.—To put to stamp, to put to press; begin printing. Holl. Hen. VIII., an. 25.

stampage (stamp'pāj), n. [< stamp + -age.] An impression; a squeeze.

No copy [of the rock inscription] was obtained until October, 1838, when the traveller Masson most carefully and perseveringly made a calico stampage and an eye-copy. Encyc. Brit., XIII. 118.

stamp-album (stamp'al'būm), n. A blank book or album used by collectors for the classification and display of postage- and revenue-stamps.

stamp-battery (stamp'bat'ēr-i), n. A series of stamps in a machine for comminuting ores. E. H. Knight.

stamp-block (stamp'blok), n. A hollow wooden block in which molasses are pounded before being cooked. [South Africa.]

stamp-collecting (stamp'kō-lēk'ting), n. The act or practice of collecting postage- or revenue-stamps. See philately.

stamp-collector (stamp'kō-lēk'tōr), n. 1. A collector or receiver of stamp-duties.—2. One who collects postage- or revenue-stamps as articles of interest or curiosity; a philatelist.

stamp-distributor (stamp'dis-trib'yū-tēr), n. An official who issues or distributes government stamps.

stamp-duty (stamp'dū'ti), n. A tax or duty imposed on the sheets of parchment or paper on which specified kinds of legal instruments are written. Stamp-duties on legal instruments, such as conveyances and deeds, are chiefly secured by prohibiting the reception of them in evidence unless they bear the stamp required by the law. Stamp-duties were first levied in England in the reign of William and Mary.

stamped (stamp'pēd'), v. [Formerly also stampede; < Amer. Sp. estampida, estampido (= Pg. estampida), n. a crush, crash, loud report; connected with estampar, stamp; see stamp, v.]

1. A sudden fright seizing upon large bodies of cattle or horses, and causing them to run for long distances; a sudden scattering of a herd of cattle or horses; hence, any sudden flight or general movement, as of an army, in consequence of a panic.
With every herd this stampede occurs; and, watching the proceedings, I hold that a drover ought to have rather more patience than John.
Mortimer Collins, Thoughts in my Garden, II. 131.

2. Any sudden unconcerted movement of a number of persons actuated by a common impulse: as, a stampede in a political convention for a candidate who seems likely to win. Stampedes in American politics have been common since the Democratic convention of 1844.

At the first ring of the bell a general stampede took place; some twenty hungry souls rushed to the dining-room.

L. M. Alcott, Hospital Sketches, p. 63.

stampede (stamp'pēd'), v. [< pret. and pp. stampeded, pp. stampeding. [< stampida, n.] I. intrans. 1. To become generally panic-stricken; take suddenly to flight, as if under the influence of a panic; scamper off in fright: said of herds or droves.—2. To move together, or take the same line of conduct, under the influence of any sudden and common impulse. See stampede, n. 2.

II. trans. 1. To cause to break and run as if panic-stricken; disperse or drive off suddenly through panic or terror.

Those most trying times when . . . the cattle are stampeded by a thunder-storm at night.

T. Roosevelt, Hunting Trips, p. 7.

2. To cause to move or act in a mass through some sudden common impulse: as, to stampede a political convention for a candidate.

stampede (stamp'pēd'), n. Same as stampede. A sudden stampede or rush of horses.

Irring.

stamper (stamp'pēr), n. [< stamp + -er.] 1. One who stamps: as, a stamper in the post-office.—2. An instrument for stamping; a stamp.—3. pl. The feet; also, shoes. [Old slang.]

Strike up, Piper, a merry, merry dance,
That we on our stampers may foot it and prance.

Brome, Jovial Crew, I.

4. A stamping-machine. (a) A machine for cleaning textile fabrics, consisting of a tub revolving horizontally, and a series of wooden stamps or pestles operated by suitable machinery. (b) In gunpowder-manuf., a machine used in small mills, consisting of ten or twelve stamps of hard wood, arranged in a row, each stamp having a bronze shoe. The material to be pulverized is placed in cavities in a block of soft oak. (c) In porcelain-manuf., a mill for pulverizing calcined flints preparatory to treatment in the grinding-vat.

5. pl. In arith., the Calceatae.

stamping hammer (stamp'ham'ēr), n. A direct-acting hammer where the hammer-block is lifted vertically, either by cams or friction-rollers, or, as is more commonly the case, by steam- or water-pressure acting on a piston in a closed cylinder. Percy.

stamp-head (stamp'hēd), n. In a stamp, the rectangular or cylindrical mass of iron at the end of the stamp-stem, which by its weight gives force to the blow. To the lower end of the stamp-head is attached the shoe, a thinner piece of chilled iron or steel, which can easily be replaced, when too much worn for service, without the necessity of replacing the whole stamp-head.

stamping (stamp'ping), n. [< ME. stampyng; verbal n. of stamp, v.] 1. The act of pounding, beating, or impressing as with a stamp.—2. Something stamped, or made by stamping-machinery.

Groups of U-shaped soft iron stampings.

Electrical Rev., XXII. 173.

3. Same as blocking, 1 (a).

stamping-ground (stamp'ping-ground), n. A place of habitual resort; a customary haunt. [Slang, U. S.]

It's with them fellows as it is with wild animals. You can just keep clear of them if you want, stay far out of their stamping-ground, hold yourself aloof all the time.

W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 170.

stamping-machine (stamp'ping-mā-shōn'), n. A machine for forming articles of hard materials, as metal, whether for the first rough shaping, or for decorative finishing.

stamping-mill (stamp'ping-mil), n. Same as stamp-mill, 1.

stamping-press (stamp'ping-pres), n. 1. In sheet-metal work, a power-machine for making hollow ware, as pans, bowls, kitchen-utensils, etc. Machines of this class are a development of the earlier stamping-machines, the direct blow or stamp having been replaced in many instances by a continuous pressure. The essential features of the machine are two dies brought one over the other by a direct blow or by pressure.

Die used in a stamping-press.

a, vertical section of die for forming a spoon; b, plan of upper die; c, side view of lower die.

Where a continuous pressure is used by the employment of a screw, cam, toggle-joint, or eccentric, forcing one die slowly upon the other, the sheet of metal is stretched and stretched into shape. The dies are often compound—one part cutting out the blank from the sheet and another part compressing it gradually into shape—or so arranged that one part takes the blank and holds it firmly by the edges, while the central part stretches it to the required shape. In some forms of these machines a series of dies are used successively, the blanks being pressed in part, then amended and repressed until the final shape is secured. Also called stamping-machine.

2. A small hand-press or seal-press used by public officials and others for impressing stamps upon or affixing them to documents, either in obedience to legal requirement or as a matter of convenience or custom. Compare seal-press.—3. Same as blocking-press. See also arming-press.

stamp-machine (stamp'mā-shōn'), n. In paper-manuf., a machine for bending rags, etc., into pulp. It consists of a number of rolls fixed into a stout oak frame, and working alternately with a set below, the water passing off through an opening covered with a fine sieve. The machine is of German origin, and is used only in small factories.

stamp-mill (stamp'mil), n. 1. In metal, a crushing-mill employing stamps or pestles to crush ores or rock to powder preparatory to treatment for extracting metals. The stamps, which are often of great size and weight, are arranged in a, undershot water-wheel; b, shaft; c, cam; d, wiper; e, lifter of pine, beech, or oak, with chilled cast-iron stamps; f, levers (otherwise called mortars or battery-boxes) which receive the "stuff" or broken ore and retain it until reduced to the required degree of fineness. The ore is fed to the stamps from an inclined platform at the rear of the levers.

a row, and are usually raised by means of wipers and cams on a revolving shaft turned by steam- or water-power. The cams release the stamps in turn, and they fall on the ore placed in chambers below, the sides of these chambers being perforated to allow the escape of the crushed material as soon as reduced to the required fineness, while a stream of water sweeps the slimes away as they are produced. Such a row of stamps is also called a stamp-battery. In another form of stamp-mill the stamp is placed at the end of the piston-rod of a steam-cylinder, on the principle of the steam-hammer. Also called stamping-mill.

2. An oil-mill employing a pestle or pestles to crush seeds and fruits.

stamp-note (stamp'nōt), n. In com., a memorandum delivered by a shipper of goods to the searcher, which, when stamped by him, allows the goods to be sent off by lighter to the ship, and is the captain's authority for receiving them on board. Simmonds.

stamp-office (stamp'of'is), n. An office where government stamps are issued, and stamp-duties and taxes are received.

stance (stans), n. [Early mod. E. also stannee; < OF. stance, estance, a station, situation, condition, also a stanchion, = Pr. estansa, station, condition, = Sp. Pg. estancia, a dwelling, = It. stanza, a station, stanza, etc., < ML. stantia, a chamber, a house, lit. a standing, < L. stan(-t)-s, ppr. of stare, stand: see stand. Cf. stanza.] 1. A station; a site; an area for building; a position; a stand. [Scotch.]

He fetched a gambol upon one foot, and, turning to the left hand, failed not to carry his body perfectly round, just into its former stance.

Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, i. 35. (Davies.)

The boy answered his invitation with the utmost confidence, and danced down from his stance with a galliard sort of step.

Scott, Kenilworth, x.

2†. Space; gap; distance.

Since I can do no better, I will set such a stance between him and Pasiphaë that all this town shall not make them friends.

Gascoigne, tr. of Ariosto's Supposes, il. 3.

With silence balm my writhing brain.

M. Arnold, Saint Brandan.

4†. To free; relieve: with of.

Yf two brether be at debate,
Loke nother thou further in her hate,
But helpe to staunche hon of malice.

Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 307.

II. intrans. 1. To stop flowing; be stanch'd. [Rare.]

Immediately her issue of blood stanch'd. Luke viii. 44.

2†. To stop; cease.

And tho wynde stanchede and blew no more,
And the meyst trunde into a bryt cloude.

Chron. Vitodun., p. 127. (Hallivell.)

stanch<sup>1</sup>, staunch<sup>1</sup> (stanch, stanch), n. [ME. stanch<sup>1</sup>, staunch<sup>1</sup>, v.] That which stanches; that which quenches or allays.

O friendship, flour of flowers, O lively sprite of lyfe, O sacred bond of blissful peace, the stalworth stanch of strife.

Poems of Vincertaine Auctors, On Friendship. (Richardson.)

lating a head of water to float boats over shallows; a weir. See stank<sup>1</sup>. E. H. Knight.

Formerly rivers used to be penned in by a series of stanches near shoal places, which held up the water, and, when several boats were collected in the pool above a stanch, it was suddenly opened, and the sudden rush of water floated the boats over the shallows below.

Encyc. Brit., XX. 573.

Quarterly Rev., CXXVI. 359, note.

Specifically—(a) The place where a witness stands to testify in court. (b) A rostrum; a pulpit.

Sometimes, indeed, very unseemly scenes take place, when several deputies (in the French Chamber), all equally eager to mount the coveted stand, reach its narrow steps at the same moment and contest the privilege of precedence.

W. Wilson, Cong. Gov., II.

(c) A stall in a stable. Hallivell.

4. Comparative position; standing, as in a scale of measurement; rank.

Nay, father, since your fortune did attain So high a stand, I mean not to descend.

Daniel, Civil Wars, IV. 90.

5. A table, set of shelves, or the like, upon which articles may be placed for safety or exhibition; also, a platform on which persons may place themselves. Specifically—(a) A small light table, such as is moved easily from place to place.

A stand between them supported a second candle.

Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xxviii.

(b) A stall for the sale of goods; any erection or station where business is carried on: as, a fruit-stand; a news-stand; a carriage-stand.

The Chief of Police (of Racine, Wisconsin), acting under instructions from the Mayor, has notified the proprietors of every cigar-store, soda-fountain, ice-cream stand, and confectionery shop to close on Sunday.

New York Evening Post, June 28, 1889.

(c) A rack, as for umbrells and canes. (d) In museums, the support for a mounted specimen of natural history; especially, a perch for mounted birds, consisting of an upright and cross-bar of turned wood, usually painted or varnished. Stands are also made in many ways, in imitation of natural objects upon which birds perch or rest. Stands for mammals are usually flat boards of suitable size, rectangular or oval, and with turned border. (e) In a microscope, the frame or support which holds the essential parts of the instrument as well as the object under examination. It includes the tube with the coarse and fine adjustments, the stage and its accessories, the mirror, etc. See microscope. (f) In printing, same as composing-stand. (g) A platform or other structure, usually raised, as for spectators at an open-air gathering, or for a band or other group of performers: as, the grand stand on a race-course.

A large wooden shed, called "The Stand," without floor or weather-boarding, capable of covering, say, four thousand persons, stood near the centre of a camp-meeting ground.

We . . . will follow Mr. Egremont to the grand stand, where ladies now sit in their private boxes much as they sat some eighteen hundred years ago to smile on the dying gladiator in the amphitheatre.

Hyde Melville, White Rose, II. iv.

Stand of ammunition. See ammunition.—Stand of armor, stand of arms, a suit of armor and weapons taken together, or, in modern times, the arms and accoutrements sufficient for one man. See arm, n.—Stand of colors, a single color or flag. Witcher.—To be at a stand, to be brought to a standstill; to be checked and prevented from motion or action.—To get a stand. See the quotation.

Occasionally these panic fits . . . make them [buffalo] run together and stand still in a stupid, frightened manner. . . . When they are made to act thus it is called in hunters parlance getting a stand on them; and often thirty or forty have been killed in one such stand, the hunter hardly shifting his position the whole time.

T. Roosevelt, Hunting Trips, p. 274.

To make a stand. (a) To come to a stop; stand still.

When I beheld this hill, and how it hangs over the way,
I suddenly made a stand, lest it should fall on my head.

Thynne, Pilgrim's Progress, p. 95.

(b) To take a position for defense or resistance; stop and fight.—To put to a stand, to stop; arrest by obstacles or difficulties; as, he was put to a stand for want of men and money.

standage (stan'dāj), n. [stand + -age.] 1. A stall.

Such straw is to be given to the draught oxen and cuttle at the standage (read standage) or the barndores.

Archæologia, XIII. 383.

2. In mining, a place underground for water to stand or accumulate in; a lodge or sump.

standard (stan'dārd), n. [Early mod. E. also standerd; < ME. standard, standerd, standard, < late AS. standard = MD. standaerd, D. standaerd = MLG. standhart, LG. standare = MIG. standert, standhart, G. standarte (perhaps < It.) = Sw. standar = Dan. standart, < OF. estandard, estandard, an ensign, standard, a point of rallying, F. étendard, un ensign, standard, flag, = Pr. estandard, estandard = Sp. estandarte = It. standardo, an ensign, standard (cf. The connection with stand is certain in the other uses; see standard<sup>2</sup>, standard<sup>3</sup>.] 1. Milit., a distinctive flag; an ensign. Specifically—(a) The principal ensign of an army, of a military organization such as a legion, or of a military division of high rank. In this sense it may be either a flag or a solid object carried on a pole, as the Roman eagle, or the dragon shown in the Bayeux Tapestry, or a combination of a flag with such an object. (b) A large flag, long in the fly in proportion to its hoist, carried before princes and nobles of high rank, especially when in military command or on occasions of ceremony. A standard of Edward III. was shaped like a long pennon, swallow-tailed, and bearing the royal arms at the hoist, the rest of the pennon being covered with fleurs-de-lis and lions semé. A standard of the Earl of Warwick, carried during the Wars of the Roses, had a cross of St. George, with the rest of the flag covered with small copies of the badge of the Nevilles, a bear and ragged staff. At the present time the word is used loosely. The so-called royal standard of Great Britain, though a standard in function, is properly a banner in form. The flags of the British cavalry regiments are called standards, to distinguish them from the colors of the infantry regiments. In the United States army a silk standard goes to every mounted regiment; it bears the national arms on a blue ground, with the number and name of the regiment underneath the eagle. See cut under tabarin.

2. In bot., sunno as banner, 5.—3. In ornith.: (a) Same as verillum. (b) A feather suggesting a standard by its shape or position. See cuts under Semioptera and standard-bearer.—4. A standard-bearer; an ensign or ancient. [Rare.] Thou shalt be my Henteant, monster, or my standard.

Shak., Tempest, III. 2. 18.

dar<sup>d</sup>, standard<sup>3</sup>.] I. n. 1. A weight, measure, or instrument by comparison with which the accuracy of others is determined; especially, an original standard or prototype, one the weight or measure of which is the definition of a unit of weight or measure, so that all standards of the same denomination are copies of it. The only original standard of the United States is a troy pound. See pound, yard, meter.

It is . . . necessary to have recourse to some visible, palpable, material standard, by forming a comparison with which all weights and measures may be reduced to one uniform size.

Blackstone, Com., I. vii.

2. In coinage, the proportion of weight of fine metal and alloy established by authority. The standard of gold coins in Great Britain is at present 22 carats—that is, 22 parts of fine gold and 2 of alloy; and the sovereign should weigh 123.274 grains troy. The standard of silver coins is 11 ounces 2 pennyweights of pure silver and 18 pennyweights of alloy, making together 1 pound troy; and the shilling should weigh 87.273 grains. The gold and silver coins in current use in the United States are all of the fineness 900 parts of the precious metal in 1,000, the gold dollar weighing 25.8 grains, and the silver dollar 412.6 grains.

That precise weight and fineness, by law appropriated to the pieces of each denomination, is called the standard.

Locke, Considerations concerning Raising (the Value of Money).

3. That which is set up as a unit of reference; a form, type, example, instance, or combination of conditions accepted as correct and perfect, and hence as a basis of comparison; a criterion established by custom, public opinion, or general consent; a model.

Let the judgment of the judicious be the standard of thy merit.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 114.

4. A grade; a rank; specifically, in British elementary schools, one of the grades or degrees of attainment according to which the pupils are classified. The amount of the parliamentary grant to a school depends on the number of children who pass the examination conducted by government inspectors—the rate per pupil differing in the different standards.

Every boy in the seventh and sixth standards would have held out his hand, as they had been well drilled on that subject.

N. and Q., 7th ser., VIII. 51.

Average standard, in copper-mining. See average<sup>2</sup>.—Double standard, a monetary standard based upon both gold and silver as the materials of the circulating medium, as distinguished from a single standard based upon either gold or silver.—Dutch standard, a set of samples of sugar put up in bottles bearing the official seal and label of the Dutch government (whence the name), and recognized as the standard of the commercial world in fixing the quality of sugars. The set comprises 10 different grades, numbered, according to the different colors of the samples, from 5 (the darkest color) to 20 (the most refined) inclusive. The quality of the sugar to be tested is determined by comparison with the samples or the standard, and the sugar is named accordingly as No. 10, 13, etc.

Dutch standard,—Gold standard, a monetary standard based upon gold as the material of the unit of value.—Metallic standard, a gold or silver standard.—Multiple standard, a monetary standard representing a considerable number of important articles in frequent use, the fluctuations in their value neutralizing one another and thus causing a substantial uniformity of value among them.

—Mural standard, any standard set up on a wall, as, for instance, a standard of measurement for convenience in testing rules, tapes, measuring-chains, etc.—Photometric standard. See photometric.—Silver standard, a monetary standard based upon silver as the material of the monetary unit.—Single standard. See double standard.—Tabular standard. Same as multiple standard.

II. a. Serving as a standard or authority; regarded as a type or model; hence, of the highest order; of great worth or excellence.

B. Tylor*.—Standing table, a permanent table, fixed in its place, or of such size and solidity that it cannot easily be moved, as the table for meals in the old English hall.

standing-cypress (stan'ding-si'pres), n. A common biennial garden-flower, Gilia coronopifolia (Ipomopsis elegans), native in the southern United States. In its tubular scarlet flowers and finely dissected leaves it resembles the cypress-vine; but it is of an erect wand-like habit.

standing-ground (stan'ding-ground), n. Place or ground on which to stand; especially, that on which one rests, in a figurative sense; a basis of operations or of argument; a fundamental principle. W. Wilson, The State, § 204.

standing-press (stan'ding-pres), n. See press, 1.

standing-room (stan'ding-röm), n. Space sufficient only for standing, as in a theater where all the seats have been taken.

standing-stool (stan'ding-stöl), n. A small frame or machine moving on wheels, used to support a child when learning to walk.

The elf dares peep abroad, the pretty foolo Can wog without a truckling standing-stool. Fletcher, Poems, p. 139. (Hallivell.)

standish (stan'dish), n. [A reduction of **stand-*

Standish of Decorated Pottery, 18th century. (From "L'Art pour Tous.")

dish, <stand + dish.] An inkstand; also, a case for writing-materials.

In which agonie tormenting my selfe a long time, I grew by degrees to a milde discontent; out, pausing I while over my standish, I resolved in verse to paynt forth my passion. Nashe, Pierce Penilesse, p. 5.

Here is another letter of Niccolini that has lain in my standish this fortnight. Watpole, Letters, II. 75.

stand-off (stand'öf), n. [stand off; see stand, v.] A holding or keeping off; a counteraction. [Colloq.]

The preferences of other clients, perhaps equal in number and value, who are fighting with Fabian tactics, make a complete stand-off. The Atlantic, LXVI. 672.

stand-off (stand'öf), a. [stand off; see stand, v.] Holding others off; distant; reserved. [Colloq.]

You always talk . . . as if there were no one but Catherine. People generally like the other two much better. Catherine is so stand-off.

Mrs. Humphry Ward, Robert Elsmere, I. 2.

stand-offish (stand'öf'ish), a. [stand off + -ish.] Same as stand-off. [Colloq.]

If the "landed gentry" were stand-offish, and . . . did not put themselves out of the way to cultivate Miss Shalton's acquaintance, that young lady was all the more grateful for their reserve.

F. W. Robinson, Her Face was her Fortune, v. 8.

stand-offishness (stand'öf'ish-nes), n. The character of being repellent; the disposition or tendency to hold others at a distance. [Colloq.]

I told him I did not like this pride and stand-offishness between mon and man, and added that if a duke were to speak to me I should try to treat him civilly.

D. C. Murray, Weaker Vessel, xxxii.

stand-pipe (stand'pīp), n. 1. A vertical pipe erected at a well or reservoir, into which water is forced by mechanical means in order to obtain a head-pressure sufficient to convey it to a distance.—2. A small pipe inserted into an opening in a water-main.—3. An upright gas-pipe connecting the retort and the hydraulic main.—4. In a steam-engine, a boiler supply-pipe elevated enough to cause water to flow into the boiler in spite of the pressure of steam.—5. A pipe on the eduction-pipe of a steam-pump to absorb the concussions due to the pulsation and irregularities caused by the necessary use of bends and changes in the direction of pipes.—6. An upright pipe, open at the top, used in connection with a hot-water heating system to allow room for the expansion of the water when heated; an expansion-pipe.—7. A portable pipe used to afford a high head of water at fires. One section of a pipe is secured to trunnions, while other sections are kept in a rack, and attached when required. When the hose is coupled, the long pipe is raised by means of a wheel, and the lower end is connected with the water-supply. Another more recent form is a derrick, elevated by two cylinders and pistons analogous in construction to those parts in a steam-engine; but the pistons are moved by the pressure of carbonic acid gas, generated, immediately as wanted, from the reaction of sulphuric acid upon a solution of sodium bicarbonate in a suitable generator. The pipe is elevated above the derrick by a wire rope, pulleys, and a hand-wheel. A movable butt or nozzle, which can be inclined to any desired angle up or down, or turned in any direction horizontally, is controlled by a man on the lower platform of the derrick, and a copious stream can thus be poured into or upon the top of a tall building. Also called water-tower.

standpoint (staud'point), n. [Tr. G. stand-punkt; as stand + point]: a word objected to by purists. The point at which one stands; especially, the position from which one's observations are taken and one's opinions formed or delivered; the point of view; the mental situation.

The attraction of different speakers from Sunday to Sunday stimulates thought, each treating his theme from his own standpoint. A. H. Alcott, Table-Talk, p. 61.

The great snare of the psychologist is the confusion of his own standpoint with that of the mental fact about which he is making his report.

H. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 106.

stand-rest (stand'rest), n. A stool, hockot, or the like serving to support a person in an almost upright position, as the miserere in medieval stalls: applied especially to a contrivance like a high stool, but with the top or seat sloping instead of horizontal.

standstill (stand'stīl), n. and a. [< stand still: see stand, v., and still, a.] I. n. A halt; a pause; a stop, especially in consequence of obstruction, exhaustion, or perplexity.

In consequence of this fancy the whole business was of a stand-still. Greville, Memoirs, Nov. 23, 1823.

II. a. Deficient in progress or advancement; unprogressive: as, a standstill policy.

stand-up (stand'up), a. 1. Standing; erect; upright; high.

He was a tall youth now; . . . he wore his tall-coat and his stand-up collar; and watched the down on his lip with eager impatience. George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, II. 7.

2. Specifically, in pugilism, noting a fair boxing-match, where the combatants stand manfully to each other, without false falls: as, a fair stand-up fight.

His face marked with strong manly furrows, records of hard thinking and square stand-up fights with life. O. W. Holmes, Poet at the Breakfast Table, I.

stane (stān), n. An obsolete and dialectal (Scotch) form of stone.

stane-raw (stān'rā), n. [Also staniraw, stein-raw, staney-rag, rock-liverwort, appar. < stane, stone, + raw (origin obscure).] A felliceous lichen, Parmelia saxatilis, used in the Scotch Highlands for dyeing brown; black crotches. [Orkney.] stang<sup>1</sup> (stang), n. [< ME. stange (proh. in part < Scand.); AS. stang, steng, stenge, a pole, red, bar, stick, stake, = MD. stangula, D. stang = MLG. stang = OHG. stanga, MHG. stange, G. stange, a pole, = Icel. stung (stang) = Sw. stång = Dan. stang, a pole, stang (cf. It. stanga, a bar, spar, + G.); < stingan (pret. stang), pierce, sting: see *sting<sup>1</sup>. [Obsolete or dialectal in all uses.] stang<sup>3</sup>. An obsolete or dialectal preterit of *sting<sup>1</sup>.

Stangeria (stan-jér'i-jī), n. [NL. (T. Moore, 1853), named after Dr. Stanger of Natal, one of the first to collect specimens of the plant.] A genus of gymnospermous plants, of the order Cycadaceæ and tribe Zamiæ, made by some a tribe Stangeriæ. It is characterized by a strobile with scales imbricated in interlocking series, a thick naked napiform cone, and leaf-segments with a strong midrib and numerous unbranched or forking nerves. There are one or two species, natives of Natal. They are singular plants with the smooth irregular trunk only about a foot high or nearly subterranean, from which rise a few coarse long-stalked pinnate fern-like leaves, inflexed in the bud, the leaflets straight in the bud, linear-lanceolate, serrated, spiny-toothed or cleft, and traversed by parallel forking veins. The fruit, a thick downy strobile or cone, is borne on a stalk surrounded by circular concave woody bracts overlapping in two or three ranks. The male plants bear cylindrical cones with numerous stamens on the under side of their compound scales. S. paradoxa, in allusion to its thick, round caudex, is called Hottentot's-head; small articles, as necklaces and snuff-boxes, are sometimes made from its seeds.

stanhope (stau'hōp), n. [So called after a Mr. Stanhope, for whom it was orig. contrived.] A light two-wheeled carriage without a top.

When the carriages met again, he stood up in his stanhope, . . . ready to doff his hat.

Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xix.

Stanhopea (stan-hō'pō-jī), n. [NL. (Frost, 1829), named after Philip Henry, Earl Stanhope, president of the London Medicobotanical Society.] A genus of orchids, of the tribe Vandee, type of the subtribe Stanhopee. It is characterized by a loose raceme of a few large flowers with spreading and nearly equal sepals, a thick fleshy lip which is commonly wavy or twisted, a straight erect or incurved column usually prolonged and two-winged above, and pollinia with flattened stalks and scale-shaped glands. The peculiar lip is highly polymorphous and complex, bearing lateral lobes which are often thickened into a solid mass forming a spurious, oblong, or sessile hypophallium, a middle lobe or epichillum which is itself often three-lobed and attached by a distinct joint, and sometimes at its base other appendages, lobes or horns—the metachillum. There are about 20 species, natives of tropical America from Brazil to Mexico. They are epiphytes with very short stems bearing many sheaths and a single large plicate leaf. The stem soon thickens into a fleshy pseudobulb, from the base of which the flower-stem proceeds. The flowers are very remarkable for their structure, size, and rich colorings, usually brown-spotted, yellow, or purple; for their great fragrance, whence the recently introduced perfume called stanhopea; and for their growth downward, not upward as in ordinary plants—a habit first discovered by the accidental breaking of a flower-pot in which the blossoms had buried themselves in the earth. They are now cultivated under glass in hard-wood baskets with interstices through which the flowers protrude.

Stanhope lens, press. See lens, press<sup>1</sup>.

staniel (stan'yel), n. [Also stanyel, stannycl, also (with the consonant i or y following n assimilated to n) stanncl, formerly stanncl, or assimilated to ch, stanchel, stanchil; < ME. staniel, stanyel, earlier **stanzella*, < AS. stāngella, stāngilla, a kestrel (erroneously used to gloss L. pelicanus) (= G. steingall, a staniel), < stān, stone, rock, + **gella, *gilla, < gellan, gillan, giclan*, yell, scream, a secondary form related to galan, sing: see stone and yell, gale<sup>1</sup>. The word is thus nearly similar in its second element to nightingale<sup>1</sup>. The E. form stone-gall is partly from the AS. with the long vowel retained, and partly (as to the 2d element) due to the G. form; the form standgall, with the same terminal syllable, simulates stand, and the form standgale (as if equiv. to windhover) is a simulated form, as if < stand + gale<sup>1</sup>.] The kestrel or windhover, Falco tinnunculus or Tinnunculus alaudarius. See cut under Tinnunculus.

Fab. Whot a dlist o' polson has she dressed him!

Sir To. And with what wing the staniel checks at it!

stankie (stangk'ki), n. Same as stank-hen. [Scotch.] stannaburrow (stan'n-bur'ō), n. [Prop. stannaburrow, < stanner + burrow<sup>2</sup>, 1, 2.] See the quotation (the etymology there suggested is erroneous).

Leaving the stream a little to the right, we shall notice several small heaps of stones placed at intervals along the slope. These little mounds, which are met with in various parts of Dartmoor, are called by the moor-men stannaburrows, which name is probably derived from the same root as the word stannary, and they were probably tin bounds set up by the miners.

W. Crossing, Ancient Crosses of Dartmoor, p. 69, quoted in N. and Q., 7th ser., V. 45.

stannary (stan'n-ri), a. and n. [Also stannery; < ML. stannaria, a tin-mine, < L. stannum, tin: see stannum.] I. a. Relating to tin, tin-mines, or the working of tin: as, "stannary courts," Blackstone, Com., III. vi.—stannary court, a court instituted at a very early period in English history for the purpose of regulating the affairs of the tin-mines and tin-miners of Cornwall.

II. n.; pl. stannaries (-riz). A region or district in which tin is mined: the English form of the Latin stannaria (or stannaria, as written in a charter of the third year of King John, 1201). The miners themselves were called stannatores or (rarely) stannatores.

For they wrongfully claim all the County of Devon to be their Stannary.

Petition to Parliament, 1 Ed. III., MS. in Rec. Office, quoted in De La Beche's Geol. Rep. on Cornwall.

If by public laws the mint were ordained to be only supplied by our stannaries, how currently would they pass for more precious than silver mines!

By. Hall, Select Thoughts, § 17.

stannate (stan'āt), n. [< stann (ie) + -ate<sup>1</sup>.] A salt of stannic acid.

stannel (stan'ol), n. See staniel.

stanner (stan'ēr), n. [Origin obscure.] A small stone; in the plural, gravel. Jamieson. [Scotch.]

stannery<sup>2</sup> (stan'ér-i), a. [ME. stann[er]ry; < stanner + -ry.] Gravelly; stony. Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 86. [Obsolete or Scotch.]

stannic (stan'ik), a. [= F. stannique; < L. stannum, tin, + -ic.] Of or pertaining to tin; procured from tin: specifically applied to those compounds in which tin appears as a quadrivalent atom: as, stannic acid,  $\text{SnO}(\text{OH})_2$ , a hydrate obtained from stannous oxid, which unites with bases to form salts called stannates.

stanniferous (sta-nif'e-rus), a. [< L. stannum, tin, + ferre = E. bear.] Containing or affording tin.

stannine (stan'in), n. [< L. stannum, tin, + -ine.] A brittle steel-gray or iron-black ore of tin, of a metallic luster, consisting of the sulphides of tin, copper, and iron, and generally zinc, found in Cornwall; tin pyrites. Also called, from its color, bell-metal ore.

stannite (stan'it), n. [< L. stannum, tin, + -ite.] Same as stannine.

stannotype (stan'ô-tip), n. [< L. stannum, tin, + Gr. τύπος, type.] In photog., a picture taken on a tin plate; a tin-type or ferrotype. Imp. Diet.

stannous (stan'us), a. [< L. stannum, tin, + -ous.] Of, pertaining to, or containing tin: specifically applied to those compounds in which tin appears as a bivalent atom: as, stannous oxid, or protoxid of tin ( $\text{SnO}$ ).

stannum (stan'um), n. [L. stannum, stagnum, tin, also an alloy of silver and lead (> It. stagno = Sp. estaño = Pg. estanho = Pr. estanh = F. étain, tain, tin); perhaps the same as L. stagnum, pool, applied to a mass of fluid metal: see stank, stagnate. Cf. Bret. stean = Corn. stean = W. ystaen = Gael. stoin = Manx stainny, tin (< L. ?): see tin.] Tin.

stannyl, n. See staniel.

stant<sup>1</sup>, a. A contracted form of standeth, third person singular present indicative of stand.

stant<sup>2</sup> (stant), n. Same as stent.

stantion (stan'shun), n. [Appar. a var. of stanchion.] Same as stemon.

stanza (stan'zä), n. [Formerly also stanzo, stanze (= Sp. estancia = G. stanz = F. stançe), in def. 2; < It. stanza, OIt. stantia, prop. an abode, lodging, chamber, dwelling, stanço, also a stanza (so called from the stop or pause at the end of it), < ML. stantia, an abode: see stance.] 1. Pl. stanze (-ze). In arch., an apartment or division in a building; a room or chamber: as, the stanza of Raphael in the Vatican.—2. In versification, a series of lines arranged in a fixed order of sequence as regards their length, metrical form, or rimes, and constituting a typical group, or one of a number of similar groups, composing a poem or part of a poem. Stanza is often used interchangeably with strophe—strophe, however, being used preferably of ancient or quantitative, and stanza of modern or accentual and rime poetry. In the latter the stanza often consists of lines identical in form throughout, the arrangement of rimes alone defining the group of lines. Such a stanza is not properly a strophe. A couplet is not regarded as a stanza, and a triplet is rarely so designated. Compare verse. Abbreviated st.

Ilmoec . . . confines himself strictly to one sort of verse, or stanza, in every Ode. Dryden, Misc., Pref.

stanzaed (stan'zäd), a. [< stanza + -ed.] Having stanzas; consisting of stanzas: as, a two-stanzaed poem.

stanzaic (stan-zä'ik), a. [< stanza + -ic.] Consisting of or relating to stanzas; arranged as a stanza. E. C. Stedman, Viet. Poets, p. 381.

stanziac (stan'zik), a. [< stanza + -ic.] Same as stanzaic. E. Wadhwa, Eng. Versification, p. 92.

stanzo (stan'zö), n. An obsolete form of stanza. Shak., As you like it, ii. 5. 18.

stapet, a. See stapen.

stapedial (stā-pē'di-äl), a. [< NL. stapedius + -äl.] 1. Stirrup-shaped: as, the stapedial bone of the ear.—2. Pertaining to the stapes or its representative, whatever its form.—stapedial ligament, the annular ligament of the stapes, connecting the foot or base of the stirrup with the margin of the fenestra ovalis.—stapedial muscle, the stapedius.—stapedial nerve, a tympanic branch of the facial which innervates the stapedial muscle.

Stapedifera (stap-ē-dif'e-rä), n. pl. [NL. (Thacher, 1877), neut. pl. of stapedifer: see stapediferous.] Those animals which have a stapes, as mammals, birds, reptiles, and amphibians; all vertebrates above fishes.

stapediferous (stap-ē-dif'e-rus), a. [< NL. stapedifer, < ML. stapes, a stirrup, + L. ferre =

E. bear.] Having a stapes; of or pertaining to the Stapedifera.

stapedius (stā-pē'di-us), n.; pl. stapedii (-ä). [NL., < ML. stapes, a stirrup: see stapes.] The stapedial muscle; a muscle of the tympanum actuating the stapes of some animals. In man the stapedius arises from a cavity hollowed out in the pyramid of the petrosal bone; its tendon passes out of a little hole in the apex of the pyramid, and is inserted into the neck of the stapes. Its action draws the head of the stapes backward, and also causes the stapes to rotate a little on a vertical axis drawn through its own center. The name is correlated with incudius and malleolus. See cut under hyoid.

Stapelia (stā-pē'li-ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), named after J. B. van Stapel, a Dutch physician and botanist (died 1636).] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Asclepiadaceæ, type of the tribe Stapeliæ. It is characterized by flowers with a wheel-shaped or reflexed corolla without appendages between the five valvate lobes, nod with the tube short and broadly bell-shaped or almost wanting, and by a decolous corolla, the outer of five horizontally spreading lobes alternate with the anthers, the inner of five scales produced into erect or arching horns. There are over 70 species, natives of South Africa. Their short fleshy leafless stems are produced into four prominent angles, which are coarsely toothed, sometimes bearing transient rudiments of leaves at the apex of the new growths. Numerous dark tubercles give the stems a grotesque appearance. Some are cultivated under glass for their beautiful and varied flowers, which are commonly very large, some reaching 12 inches (S. gigantea sometimes 14 inches) in diameter, of singular structure and often exquisitely marbled or dotted. In other species they are dingy or unattractive, usually coarse, thick, fleshy, and short-lived, and in most species exhale transiently a fetid odor of carrion, attracting flies which deposit their eggs upon them in large quantities. Their colors are largely the livid-purple and lurid-reddish, yellow, and brownish hues which are associated with disagreeable odors also in Rafflesia, Aristolochia, Amorphophallus, and others of the largest flowers. They are sometimes called carrion-flowers; S. bignonifolia is known, from its blotches, as toad-flower; and S. Asterias, from its spreading narrow-parted corolla, as starfish-flower.

Stapelia variegata.

Stapeliæ (stap-ē'li-ä), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1836), < Stapelia + -æ.] A tribe of gamopetalous plants, of the order Asclepiadaceæ. It is characterized by valvate and commonly fleshy corollalobes, waxy erect or laterally placed pollen-masses solitary in each anther-cell, and obtuse or retuse unappendaged anthers, closely incumbent over the disk of the stigma or partly immersed in it. The 16 genera are plants commonly with short, thick, fleshy stems, coarsely angled or tubercled, without leaves except in the East Indian genus Frerea; one genus, Boucardia, extends into Europe in Spain and Sicily; the others, as Stapelia, the type, are mostly South African.

stapen, a. Stopped; advanced. Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, l. 270.

stapes (stā'pēs), n. [NL., < ML. stapes, a stirrup, < OHG. stapf, stapf = D. stap, etc., a step: see step, and cf. stapier.] In zool. and anat., the inmost one of the three auditory ossicles of man and other mammals, situated in the tympanum, or middle ear. The stapes is connected on the one hand with the incus, and on the other with the fenestra ovalis, and is moved by a small muscle called the stapedius. The name is derived from the close resemblance in shape of the human stapes to a stirrup.

1. Of Man (the surface of its foot separately shown). 2. Of Seal (Phoca vitulina). 3. Of Chick (its foot separately shown, and cartilaginous parts in dotted outline). m.st, mediotapedial part, forming with the stapes proper (columella); est, extrastapedial part; ist, infra-stapedial part; ist, supra-stapedial part.

In man the bone presents a head, with a little fossa for movable articulation with the orbicular incudal bone; a neck or constricted part; two branches, legs or crura; and an oval base or foot. This bone is morphologically one of the proximal elements of the hyolidean arch. The corresponding element in birds and reptiles is very differently shaped, and is sometimes called stapes, oftener columella. It is rod-like or columellar, with an expanded base fitting the fenestra ovalis, the other end usually showing a cross-bar. Parts of such a stapes are distinguished as mediotapedial, the main shaft; extrastapedial, the part beyond the cross-bar; infra-stapedial, the lower arm of the cross-bar; and supra-stapedial, the upper arm of the cross-bar—the last being supposed to represent the incus of mammals. Some of these parts may be wanting, or only represented by a ligament, or coalesced with a part of the mandibular arch. The stapes or columella furnishes the primitive actual or virtual connection of the hyolidean arch with the periotic capsule. See stapedial, columella, & (b), and cuts under hyoid, Pythonidae, and Annular ligament of the stapes. See ligament and stapedial.

Staphisagria (staf-i-sag'ri-ä), n. [NL. (Tragus, 1546), < ML. staphisagria, staphysagria, stafisagria, etc.; prop. two words, staphis agria, < Gr. as if **staphis agrio*: staphis, a dried grape, a raisin, also (in L. staphis) the plant stavesacre; agrio, fem. of agrios, wild, < agros, a field, the country. The E. form of the name is stavesacre, q. v.] A former genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Ranunculaceæ. It is now classed as a section of the genus Delphinium, and as such distinguished by a short spur, from three to five ovaries forming bladderly few-seeded capsules, and biennial habit. See Delphinium and stavesacre, also ointment of stavesacre (under ointment).

staphisagria (staf-i-sag'rik), a. [< Staphisagria + -ie.] Contained in or derived from Staphisagria. Encyc. Diet.

staphisagrine (staf-i-sag'rin), n. [< Staphisagria + -ine.] A poisonous amorphous alkaloid, soluble in ether and in water, obtained from Delphinium Staphisagria, or stavesacre.

staphyle (staf'i-lä), n. [NL., < Gr. σταφύλη, a bunch of grapes, also the uvula when swollen.] The uvula.

Staphylea (staf-i-lä'), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), abridged from Staphylodendron (Tournefort, 1700), < L. staphylodendron, a shrub thought to have been S. pinnata; prob. so named from its clustered fruit, < Gr. σταφύλη, a bunch of grapes, + δένδρον, a tree.] A genus of polypetalous plants, type of the order Staphyleaceæ. It is characterized by an ovary which is two- or three-parted to the base, contains numerous biserial ovules, and ripens into an inflated and bladderly membranous capsule, discharging its few seeds at the apex of the two or three lobes. There are species, natives of Europe, the Himalayas, Japan, and North America. They are shrubs with numerous roundish branches, bearing opposite stipulate leaves, each composed of from three to five leaflets, which are involute in the bud and are furnished with stipels. The white flowers, with five erect petals, hang from nodding panicles or racemes. The large and peculiar fruit is the source of the common name bladder-nut. (See cut under nectary.) S. pinnata, also called bag-nut, common in hedgerows and thickets in Europe, bears hard smooth nuts sometimes used for rosaries.

Staphyleaceæ (staf'i-lä-ä'sä-ä), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1825), < Staphylea + -acæ.] An order of polypetalous plants, of the cohort Sapindales, long classed as a suborder of the Sapindaceæ, from which it is distinguished by its regular bisexual flowers with the five stamens inserted outside of the base of the disk, by albuminous and sometimes arillate seeds with a straight embryo, and by opposite simple or compound leaves. It includes 16 species, of 4 genera, of which Staphylea is the type; of the others, Turpinia includes a number of small trees and shrubs with roundish berry-like fruit, mostly of tropical Asia and America, and Euscaphis a few Japanese shrubs bearing coriaceous foli- cles. See cut under bladder-nut.

staphyline (staf'i-lin), a. [< Gr. σταφύλιος, of or pertaining to a bunch of grapes, < σταφύλη, a bunch of grapes, also the uvula.] 1. Having the form of a bunch of grapes; botryoidal.—2. Pertaining to the uvula or to the entire palate.—staphyline glands, palatine glands.

staphylinid (staf-i-lin'id), n. and a. I. n. A rove-beetle, as a member of the Staphylinidae.

II. a. Of or pertaining to the family Staphylinidae; staphylinine.

Staphylinidae (staf-i-lin'i-dä), n. pl. [NL. (Leach, 1817), < Staphylinus + -idae.] A large and important family of brachelytrous elavicorn beetles, commonly called rove-beetles. They resemble the Pselaphidae in having short elytra, but differ in having the abdomen flexible and consisting of eight ventral segments. The antennæ are generally eleven-jointed, the labial palpi three-jointed, and the maxillary four-jointed. The short truncate elytra usually leave most of the abdomen exposed, and this, when the beetles are disturbed, is turned up over the back, as if the insects were about to sting. A familiar example is the Oecypus olens, known as the cocktail or devil's coach-horse. (See Gobrius, and cut under devil.) Some species discharge an odorous fluid from the tip of the abdomen. The larvae resemble the adults, and are found under bark, in fungi, decaying plants, and the excrement of animals, in ants' nests, hornets' nests, and the nests of certain birds. It is one of the largest and most wide-spread of the families of Coleoptera. About 1,000 species are known in America north of Mexico, and about 5,000 in the whole world. Also Staphylinoides, Staphylinus, Staphylinidae, Staphylini, Staphylinites. See cuts under Hemallium and rove-beetle.

staphyliniform (staf-i-lin'i-förm), a. [< NL. Staphylinus, q. v., + L. forma, form.] Resembling a rove-beetle; related to the Staphylinidae.

staphylinine (staf-i-lin'in), a. Of or pertaining to the Staphylinidae.

Staphylinus (staf-i-lī'nus), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1758), < Gr. staphylinoi, a kind of insect, < staphylē, a bunch of grapes.] The typical genus of the family Staphylinidae, formerly corresponding to that family in a broad sense. Used with various limitations, it is now made type of the restricted family, and characterized by having the mandibular palpi with the fourth joint equal to or longer than the third, the marginal lines of the thorax united near the apex, the ligula emarginate, the middle coxae slightly separate, and the abdomen narrowed at the tip. The species are numerous, and among them are the largest forms in the family. Twenty-one are known in America north of Mexico, and about 100 in the whole world.

staphylion (stā-fil'i-on), n. [NL., < Gr. staphylion, dim. of staphylē, the uvula: see staphylē.] The median point of the posterior nasal spine. Török.

staphylitis (staf-i-lī'tis), n. [< staphylē, the uvula, + -itis.] Uvulitis.

staphyloma (staf-i-lō'mā), n.; pl. staphylomata (-mā-tā). [NL., < Gr. staphylōma, a defect in the eye, < staphylē, a bunch of grapes.] A name given to certain local bulgings of the eyeball. — Staphyloma corneæ, a protrusion involving more or less of the cornea, such as may result from preceding ulceration. Also called anterior staphyloma. — Staphyloma corneæ pellucidum, conical cornea. Also called staphyloma pellucidum. — Staphyloma posticum, posterior staphyloma; sclerorhoiditis in the back part of the eye, resulting in a thinning of the coats and consequent bulging and progressive myopia.

staphylomatic (staf'i-lō-mat'ik), a. [< staphyloma + -ic.] Characterized or affected by staphyloma.

staphylomatous (staf-i-lō-mā'tus), a. [< staphyloma + -ous.] Pertaining to or of the nature of staphyloma.

staphyloplasty (staf'i-lō-plas'ti), n. [< Gr. staphylē, the uvula, + plastēōn, form, shape: see plastic.] In surg., an operation for restoring the soft palate when it is defective.

staphylorrhaphy (staf-i-lor'ā-fī), n. [< Gr. staphylē, the uvula, + raphē, a sewing.] In surg., the plastic operation for cleft palate, consisting in uniting the mucous membrane across the cleft. Also called cionorrhaphia, palatorrhaphy.

staphylotome (staf'i-lō-tōm), n. [< Gr. staphylōtōmē, a knife for excising the uvula, < staphylē, the uvula, + tēmōn, raimōn, cut.] In surg., a knife for operating upon the uvula or the palate.

staphylotomy (staf-i-lōt'ō-mī), n. [< Gr. staphylōtōmē, the excision of the uvula, < staphylē, the uvula, + tōmē, < tēmōn, raimōn, cut: see -tomy.] In surg., amputation of the uvula.

staple (stā'pl), n. [ME. stapel, stapil, stapille, stapul, < AS. stapel, stapul, stapul, a prop, post (= OS. stapel = OFries. stapil, stapel = MD. stapel, D. stapel, a prop, foot-rest, a seat, pile, heap, = MLG. Cf. staple.] 1. A post; a prop; a support.

Under eek stapel of his bed,
That he uske, four thail hid.

The Scryn Sages, 201. (Halliwell.)

2. A loop of metal, or a bar or wire bent and formed with two points, to be driven into wood to hold a hook, pin, or bolt.

Massy staples,
And corresponsive and fulfilling bolts.
Shak., T. and C., ProL, i. 17.

3. In founding, a piece of nail-iron with a flat disk riveted to the head, and pointed below, used in a mold to hold a core in position. E. H. Knight.—4. Of a lock, same as box, 13.—5. In musical instruments of the oboe class, the metallic tube to which the reeds are fastened, and through which the tone is conveyed from them into the wooden body of the instrument.—6. In coal-mining, a shallow shaft within a mine. [North. Eng.]—Seizin by hasp and staple. See hasp.—Staple of a press, the frame or uprights of a hand printing-press. C. T. Jacob, Printers' Vocab.

staple (stā'pl), v. t.; pret. and pp. stapled, ppr. stapling. [< staple, n.] To support, attach, or fix by means of a staple or staples. Elect. Rev., XVI, 5.

staple (stā'pl), n. and a. [Early mod. E. staple; < OF. estaple, estape, F. étape (ML. stapula), a market, store, store-house, = G. stapel (Sw. stapel, Dan. stapel, in comp.), < MD. stapel = MLG. LG. stapel, a market, emporium, appar. a particular use of stapel, a pile, heap: see staple.] 1. n. 1. A settled mart or market; an emporium; a town where certain commodities are chiefly taken for sale. In England, formerly, the king's staple was established in certain ports or towns, and certain goods could not be exported without being first brought to these ports to be rated and charged with the duty payable to the king or the public. The principal commodities on which customs were levied were wool, skins, and leather, and these were originally the staple commodities.

The first ordination of a Staple, or of one only settled Mart-towne for the uttering of English wools & woollen fells, instituted by the sayd K. Edward.

Hakluyt's Voyages, To the Reader.

Hence—2. A general market or exchange.

Tho. O sir, a Staple of News! or the New Staple, which you please.

P. Jun. What's that?

Fash. An office, sir, a brave young office set up. . . .

P. Jun. For what?

Tho. To enter all the News, sir, of the time.

Fash. And vent it as occasion serves.

B. Jonson, Staple of News, i. 1.

3. A commercial monopoly formed by a combination of merchants acting under the sanction of the royal privilege of fairs and markets. Foreign staple was the system of trade carried on by this monopoly on the continent; home staple was the business organized by it in lending towns in England.

Their nymo in this edict is, if possible, to draw for the loue of currents the staple of diuers merchandise to that city.

Sir Thomas Roe, Negotiations (London, 1740).

4. The principal commodity grown or manufactured in a locality, either for exportation or home consumption—that is, originally, the merchandise which was sold at a staple or mart.

The prices of bread-stuffs and provisions, the staples of the North, and of cotton and tobacco, the staples of the South, were high, not only absolutely, but relatively.

Taussig, Tariff History, p. 19.

5. The principal element of or ingredient in anything; the chief constituent; the chief item.

He has two very great faults, which are the staple of his bad side.

Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit, vi.

Politics, theology, history, education, public improvements, personal matters, are conventional staples.

Harper's Mag., LXXX, 466.

6. The material or substance of anything; raw or unmanufactured material.—7. The fiber of any material used for spinning, used in a general sense and as expressive of the character of the material: as, wool of short staple; cotton of long staple, etc.—Corrector of the staplet. See corrector.—Merchant of the staplet. See merchant.—Ordinance of Staple. Same as Statute of Staple.—Staple of land, the particular nature and quality of land.—Statute of Staple, or Ordinance of Staple, an English statute of 1353 (27 Edw. III., st. 2), recognizing the ancient custom of staple, and confirming the rights and privileges of merchants under it.—Statute staple. See statute.

II. a. 1. Pertaining to or being a mart or staple for commodities: as, a staple town.

Flanders is Staple, as men tell mee,
To all nations of Christianitie.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I, 159.

2. Mainly occupying commercial enterprise; established in commerce: as, a staple trade.—3. According to the laws of commerce; marketable; fit to be sold.

Will take off their wme at their own rates, and trouble not themselves to examine whether it be staple or no.

Swift.

4. Chief; principal; regularly produced or made for market: as, staple commodities.

staple (stā'pl), v.; pret. and pp. stapled, ppr. stapling. [< staple, n.] 1. intrans. To erect a staple; form a monopoly of production and sale; establish a mart for such purpose. Hakluyt's Voyages, I, 437. [Rare.]

II. trans. 1. To furnish or provide with a staple or staples.

Fleeces stapled with such wool

As Lincoln cannot yield more ther stuff.

Greene, Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay.

2. To sort or classify according to the length of the fiber: as, to staple wool.

staple-house (stā'pl-hous), n. [MD. stapelhuys; as staple + house.] A warehouse where commodities chargeable with export duties were stored. See staple, n., 1.

In their large staple-house on the Thames. . . were stored the collections of raw produce—wool, tin, and hides the chief of them—which England sent away to foreign countries.

F. Martin, Hist. of Lloyd's, p. 2.

staple-punch (stā'pl-punch), n. A bifurcated punch used for pricking holes in blind-slats and rods for the reception of staples.

stapler (stā'plēr), n. [< staple + -er.] 1. A merchant of the staple; a monopolist. See staple, n., 3.

You merchants were wont to be merchant staplers.

Middleton, Family of Love, i. 3.

2. One employed in assorting wool according to its staple.

Mr. Glegg retired from active business as a wool-stapler.

George Eliot, Middlemarch, l. 12.

staple-right (stā'pl-rīt), n. A right, possessed by municipalities of the Netherlands, and thence introduced into the New Netherlands (New York), of compelling passing vessels either to stop and offer their merchandise for sale first of all in the market-place of the town, or to pay a duty.

star (stār), n. [(a) < ME. starre, sterre, storre, stocorre (pl. starres, sterres, stocores, sterren, stocoren), < AS. stocorra = OS. sterro = OFries. stera = MD. sterre, starre, D. ster, star = MLG. sterre = OHG. sterro, MHG. sterre, a star; with formative -ra (perhaps orig. -na, -r-na being assimilated to -ra, the word being then orig. ult. identical with the next). (b) E. dial. starn, stern, < ME. stern, sterne (perhaps < Scand.) = MD. sterne = MLG. sterne, stern, LG. stern = OHG. sterno, MHG. stern (also OHG. MHG. stern), G. stern, < Icel. stjarna = Sw. stjerna = Dan. stjerne = Goth. stairno, a star; with a formative -na, -no (seen also in the orig. forms of sun and moon), from a base **ster*; cf. L. stella (for **sternia*) (> It. stella = Sp. estrella = OF. estoile, F. étoile), star, = Gr. ἀστήρ (astēr), a star, ἀστρον (> L. astrum), usually in pl. ἀστρα, the stars (with prothetic a-), = Corn. Bret. sternen = W. seren (for **sternen*) = Skt. tārā (for **stārā*), a star, star, pl., the stars, = Zend star, star; root unknown. If, as has been often conjectured, star has a connection with strew, it must be rather as 'strown' or 'sprinkled' over the sky than as 'sprinkler' of light.] 1. Any celestial body which appears as a luminous point. In ordinary modern language star is frequently limited to mean a fixed star (see below). In astrology the stars, especially the planets, are supposed to exercise an influence upon human destinies.

His eye twynkled in his head aright,

As doon the sterres in the frosty nyght.

Chaucer, Gen. ProL to C. T., i. 268.

There shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars.

Shak., J. C., i. 2. 140.

You are, thanks to your stars, in mighty credit.

Decker, Gull's Hornbook, p. 114.

Hence—2. Destiny. [Rare.]

I was not born unto riches, neither is it, I think, my star to be wealthy. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, li. 13.

3. Anything which resembles a star.

His charger trampling many a prickly star
Of sprouted thistle on the broken stones.

Tennyson, Geraint.

Specifically—(a) A star-shaped figure made of silver, gold, or both, sometimes set with jewels, worn usually upon the breast as one of the insignia of a higher class of an honorary order. See insignia, and cuts under bath, garter, and Order of St. Michael (under order).

While peers, and dukes, and all their sweeping train,
And garters, stars, and coronets appear.

Pope, R. of the L., i. 85.

(b) The asterisk (*). See asterisk. (c) In pyrotechny, a small piece of inflammable composition, which burns high in air with a colored flame, and presents the appearance of a star. (d) A group of cracks or flaws radiating from a center.

Three times slipping from the outer edge,
I bump'd the lee into three several stars.

Tennyson, The Epic.

(e) A spot of white or light color on the forehead of an animal.

Onward, eadhlaito mho,
With the white star in thy forehead!

Longfellow, Spanish Student, iii. 6.

(f) In zoöl.: (1) A star-animal; a starfish, or other echinoderm of obviously radially figure, as a brittle-star, feather-star, ily-star, sand-star, or sun-star. See the compounds. (2) A stellate sponge-spicule; an aster. (g) In a copperplate or lithographic printing-press, the radial spokes on the roller, which serve as handles. E. H. Knight.

4. Figuratively, a person of brilliant or attractive qualities; one who shines preëminently; specifically, the chief and preëminent actor or actress of a dramatic or operatic company.

Sole star of all that place and time,
I saw him—in his golden prime,
The Good Haroun Alraschid.

Tennyson, Arabian Nights.

If I were now to receive a message from the planet Mars offering me a star engagement, I could not be more astonished than I was on that day. J. Jefferson, Autobiog., iii.

5. In her., same as estoile.—6. In fort., a small fort having five or more points, or salient and reëntering angles flanking one another. Also called star-fort.—7. An additional life bought by a player in the game of pool. [Eng.]

Only one star is allowed in a pool; and when there are only two players left in, no star can be purchased.
